For a while it appeared that the Kennedys could set their own pace, one which would be tantalizing and infuriating to integrationist and Dixiecrat alike. But their ability to do so was threatened increasingly by the civil rights movement. The government was forced, unwillingly, into situations embarrassing to itself in numerous Deep South areas. It still only took negligible action, however, even when Negroes were beaten, jailed, and sometimes killed for their efforts. But, imperceptibly at first and later with unavoidable power, the civil rights movement began producing crises which required more controversial Administration responses. The first important one, perhaps, was the entry of James Meredith into the University of Mississippi, which forced JFK into sending troops. More important, though, were the series of revolts building up to the Birmingham crisis of April and May and followed by exploding Negro direct action in the North. History will record if these events finally burned the bridge between the liberal and conservative factions of the Democratic Party. The President was coerced into a "crash" program of mobilizing community support for voluntary desegregation, and he sent to Congress the biggest civil rights proposal to date.

A New Era

Although inadequate in the judgment of the civil rights movement, it did contain sections which would bar discrimination in most public accomodations; further, legalize the role of the Attorney General in litigation against school segregation, and place voter referees in certain Black Belt counties. While calling for restraint by Negroes, however, the President did not publicly demand a change in Dixiecrat behavior. There began instead a typical flurry of private political dealing. This time, however, the Kennedy role as broker was threatened by the steady evaporation of a basis for barganining between liberals and Southerners in the Democratic Party. Liberals, especially those with Negro constituencies, are currently pressing for more comprehensive legislation, while the Administration wants a moderate bill in order to obtain Republican support for a measure the Dixiecrats violently oppose.

It now appears that the Dixiecrats have prevented the passage of a bill this session, but the consequence is the greatest tension in party politics since 1948. Inaction of civil rights will increase the militance of the Negro movement, which will, in turn, create so much disturbance that the need for federal remedial action will become all the greater. It will also increase the discontent of Dixiecrats and liberal Democrats, not only with each other, but with the Kennedy establishment.

How long can this stalemate persist? The present tension may be a symptom of the weakening, and perhaps the decline, of the Southern oligarchy. America is obviously passing into a new era of social conflict. One of the enemies, and hopefully a victim, of this transition is the Dixiecrat; for he cannot answer the question posed by a civil rights leader at the March on Washington: "Where is our Party?"

NOTES:

1. "An earlier study of 56 roll-call controversies between 1949-56 corroborates these findings and testifies to the longevity of Dixiecrat influence...both Southern Democrats and non-Southern Democrats are split within their own ranks, but two out of three Southerners support the "conservative-isolationist" view on labor-management policy, displaced persons, taxation and revenue policy, use of treaty power, public housing, rent control, and some other economic issues, while two out of three non-Southern Democrats will support the "liberal-internationalist," concludes H.D. Price, in "Scale Analysis of Senate Voting Patterns, 1949-56" (Harvard, unpublished PhD. thesis, 1958). Price, however, underestimates actual Dixiecrat strength by not going on to point out that the two conservative Dixiecrats in every three are usually the highest in seniority and committee placament.

2. Of the 16 Senators with the highest seniority, 14 are Southerners; in the House, 66 of the top 125 are Southerners.

3. Southerners chair 14 of the 21 Senate committees and 11 of the 18 House committees

ADDENDA:

The pressures weakening the Old Guard are these: first, the voter registration and general political insurgency of Southern Negroes cannot be tranquilized. It can only spread to Northern Negro communities and spill over to create a massive social demand for full employment, housing, and school improvements.

Second, the Negro revolt takes place in the midst of a broad shift away from rural-conservative power to urban-liberal political strength which the Supreme Court's stand on reapportionment (Maker vs. Carr) is accelerating. The 1958 elections were an early and significant sign of this trend. In that year 15 liberal Democrats and three liberal Republicans were elected to the Senate, and since 1957, the Republican bloc in the Senate has been reduced from 45 to 33. In itself this trend has shifted the balance-of-power from conservatives to the moderates in the Senate. Senator Clark recently charted the path of conservative decline in a brilliant speech to the Senate. Speaking against the remaining conservative "Senate establishment", Clark pointed out that > since 1958 the establishment has lost control of the Banking and Currency Committee, the Commerce Committee, the Committee on Government Operations, the Interior Committee, and as of Monday, believe it or not, the Judiciary Committee. They never had control of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. They have lost control of the Public Works Committee.

> Therefore time is on our side. Unless catastrophe overtakes the liberals of both parties in the election of 1964, I predict that we are within striking distance of obtaining control of the committee system of the Senate for the liberal and forward-looking elements on both sides of the aisle. (Congressional Record, 20 February 1963, p. 2530)

As Clark shows conclusively, the Dixiecrats still are over-represented on the crucial Appropriations, Armed Services, Finance, Foreign Relations and Steering Committees. But here a third set of factors runs against the old guard:

Time and seniority are running down. As William Korns demonstrates (in the New Republic, 16 March 1963, p. 6):

--the Senate majority now consists of 23 Southerners, 37 Westerners, 13 Midwesterners, and 13 Easterners. But 22 of the Southerners entered the Senate before 1958 while nine of the Westerners, none of the Midwesterners, and ten of the Easterners entered since that time. Thus an attrition rate is working against the South;

--six incumbents died during the 87th Congress. Of the 17 incumbent Democrats now 65 years or over, ten are Southerners. Of the 36 now 55 or over, 19 are Southerners;

--in 1964, when Johnson is likely to win with ease, 19 non-Southerners and only 6 Southerners will be up for re-election. If the liberals do not suffer disastrous losses in 1964, then they can look forward to the greater seniority which they will receive in the 88th Congress and to the probable setbacks for the ten Southern Democrats who must run in the harder mid-term contests of 1966.

Korns concludes: "...despite the prospect of some net losses among non-Southern Democrats over the next two elections, the present age-tenure composition of the Senate majority points to an inevitable shift in the pattern of seniority, with non-Southerners rising to the ranks now occupied by Southerners."

The House is changing subtly as well. Congressional Quarterly's 1962 elections analysis showed that only 25 of 69 retiring congressmen supported the President. Of the 67 new members, 27 are expected to be supporters of the President. This is hardly soothing information for the liberal, but it does indicate that the dwindling GOP-Dixiecrat coalition will be pressed even harder to find enough allies on all issues--their hegemony is broken, if not their ability to obstruct.

While this toppling process goes on "above" in Congress, "below" in Dixieland many Democratic politicians are either reconstructing themselves or being forced into it by the Negro voter and incipient Republicanism. Young, ambitious Governor Hollins, in retiring from the South Carolina gubernatorial chair, received a standing ovation from his legislature this spring when he acknowledged that the 1954 school desegregation was the "fact of the land". Only two Southern governors supported Ross Barnett in his "quarantine" of Ole Miss. "We believe in law and order and in the principle that all laws apply equally to all citizens," declared Georgia's Governor Sanders at his 1963 inaugural. The trend towards a new political fashion is clear.

Hurrying things along significantly is the development of a Republican, urban-and-suburban political party in the South, created largely by the influx of business professionals and aging citizens from the North. Ten years ago the Republicans were completely missing from the Southern scene. In 1961 there were nine Republicans in the House. Today there are 14, and the party plans to run candidates in every district of the South next year. They inevitably will force the Democrats to heed the lower classes and middle class "good citizens" in the urbanizing South more than the rural reactionaries. No more pungent question could be addressed President Johnson than that of I. Lee Potter, chairman of the GOP Southern political drive:

> How popular will they (the Administration) be in the large urban centers of the North if they continue to accept segregationist votes? How popular will they be among Northern Negroes if they continue to imprison the Southern Negro in a one-party Democratic South?

Johnson is political, and wary of the threat which Potter outlines. It is probably no coincidence that Kennedy's political biographer, James MacGregor Burns, in his new book, Deadlock of Democracy, points the way to a realignment of the political parties in the near future. Dividing the liberal and conservative factions of both parties into what he calls "presidential" and "congressional", Burns forecasts that

> The presidential party that first gains control of its congressional party will dominate the politics of the center-left or center-right for decades to come. (p.339)

The current "presidential party", of course, intends to dominate. Kennedy, had he lived, might well have alienated the South as soon as November, setting the conditions for realignment. LBJ, however, may postpone that inevitable day because of his traditional Southern support. However, the trend is irresistable: the Dixiecrats are outmoded. The problem now is to hasten their decline, of course, but more importantly, to ask whether the party of Wagner and Daley and Johnson is "our party".

To summarize, a review of events indicates that the present Dixiecrat bluster and filibuster on Capitol Hill--no matter how influential at the moment--may be the last stand for an idea, for a political style, and for a cadre of political men whose power makes a profound mark on American history. With the Southern Bourbons on the edge of eclipse it is now perhaps time to suggest, briefly, a new agenda of problems which might be confronting the nation before very long.

Prior to any liberal rejoicing over the fall of the South, it must be seen that in nearly every instance of change today, the formal institutions of Jim Crow are being replaced by the deceit of the white commercial class. Urbanization in the South may lead to the scrapping of Negroes and other poor people into the "inner cities". Industrialization and automation, especially in the capital-starved South, may push the Negroes and poor whites still further below the lowest rungs of the economic ladder. These are matters of the immediate future in the South, but not so in the North. If I am less than enthusiastic for the new epoch, it is because I know well the North and its white snaring suburbs, its complicated barriers that never seem either up or down, its millions of insulated consciences. I see the South, in the next few years, becoming part of a nation that cares only for its images and its social peace--while millions and millions and millions live hideously deprived in the city ghettoes, unable to muster quite enough political force to change their condition. In this situation, the Southern politician, shifting from Bourbon to bourbon, will become the same corrupted man of promise which the North has heard through history. The task of defeating the ultras is nearing a climax; but this may be less a reason for rejoicing than for a new wariness.

This paper was originally delivered at a conference of the Student Non-violent Co-ordinating Committee in the Spring of 1963. It was later published in pamphlet form by the Students for a Democratic Society.

MISSISSIPPI'S ECONOMICS

AND

MISSISSIPPI'S "NEW IMAGE"?

This paper was prepared for the Freedom Democratic Party by Mike Bruland. Mike has the Master of Arts degree from the University of Minnesota and is currently doing research on fair employment practices in Mississippi.

Many important people in Mississippi nowadays are concerned about "Mississippi 's Image." If one reads the newspapers, watches TV or listens to the radio, one always finds some businessman or politician expressing concern about "Mississippi's Image." So important is this image that it often forces businessmen and politicians to say things they would rather not say. Such is the case when on January 21, 1964, Governor Paul B. Johnson said in his inaugural address: "I would point out to you that the Mississippi economy is not divisible by party or faction, or even by race, color or creed. As a practical matter, we are at this moment in the mainstream of National light. National policies have a direct bearing on our economy, on our political freedom, on our daily living, whether we like it or not -- If I must fight it will not be a rearguard defense; it will be for our share of tomorrow." This very moderate statement was spoken after a bitter, racist campaign.

What is it that causes this concern about "Mississippi's Image?" Basically it is the fact that, whether it likes it or not, Mississippi needs money from the rest of the country for politicians to run the state and businessmen to make a profit. Mississippi talks about state's rights and the interference of the Federal Government, but the facts are that in recent years Mississippi has received more money from the Federal Government than it has paid out in taxes to it. Mississippi is trying desperately to get new industry to come to the state to provide more jobs for unemployed and underemployed people. Mississippi needs the tourists' dollars. Therefore, Mississippi is concerned about its image.

Immediately, a number of questions come up. What is behind "Mississippi's Image?" Is there really a "New Mississippi?" If so, how does it differ from the "Old Mississippi?" Have the people of Mississippi benefited from the changes that have taken place?

AGRICULTURE

Cotton is still the single most important crop in Mississippi, but things are changing; it is not nearly as important a crop as it was just 25 years ago. In 1961 the money received by the farmers of the state for selling cotton and cotton seed was only 45.5% of all the money earned by farmers by selling all kinds of crops. In 1940 the money received from selling cotton was 61.8% of the money made from selling all farm crops, including cotton. More and more cotton is being raised on only the large plantations of the Delta, where rich soil and more and more use of machinery like cotton pickers has resulted in larger and larger crops on less and less land. In 1940, 1 million more acres of cotton were planted than in 1960; but in 1960, because of the use of machines and fertilizer, much more cotton was harvested.

There are also fewer acres being planted in corn now than in 1940. In 1962 two million fewer acres of corn were planted than in 1940; also the total corn harvested was one-third less.

What agricultural products are taking the place of cotton and corn. The Answer is that although the number of acres of rice and soybeans is being increased in the Delta, most of the land not planted with corn or cotton has become pasture and woodland.

The greater amount of land in pasture shows that more and more cattle and poultry are being raised. In 1940 for every $100 made from selling farm products, $28 of it was made selling cattle and poultry. In 1960, though, for every $100 of farm products sold, $40 was made from selling livestock. In 1960, three times more beef cattle were sold, than in 1940 and five times more broilers were sold in 1960 than in 1940.

What is important to the people of Mississippi, particularly the Negroes, is the fact that less and less land is being planted with crops and more and more land is becoming pasture and woodland; and even more important, the greater use of machines and fertilizer in agriculture, have resulted in the loss of jobs. The Mississippi Economic Council's report, "Mississippi Agriculture and Forestry Trends and Prospects," talks about it this way:

> The substantial increase in farm output has been accomplished mainly through research and the adoption of a vast array of management and technological improvements. Many farmers and farm workers have left the farm. The 252,000 people employed on Mississippi farms and comprise less than half the 1940 number. The enormity of the increase in farm labor efficiency made possible through better management and technology is emphasized when we consider that Mississippi farms are now able to produce more than 1½ times the volume of their 1940 output with only 46% as many workers.

Perhaps an example taken from a report on the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union can help put these numbers into more human terms, to show what this means to human beings:

> What the Union is fighting is the rich farmer who operates his plantation like a huge, inhuman industrial corporation. Visitors from other countries come to Mississippi to see one of the world's largest plantations, the Delta Pine and Land Corporation, which owns more than 60 square miles of land in Bolivar County alone. They are amazed at how so few men can run so many acres so well with so few workers. Delta Pine and Land Corporation, owned in England, is typical of the way bigger and bigger farms are raising most of the crops in this country. From the civil war to about 1930 the large slave-owner's plantations were divided up among large numbers of sharecroppers. But since 1930 the number of Negro sharecroppers and renters has become smaller because farm land costs too much for poor people today -- $500 an acre. And there is very little land for sale. For the Negro, there is practically none at all.

Although the sharecropper has never been able to earn enough to feed and house his family in the Delta, he at least lived on and farmed some land. In a sense, the land was his to work, though not to own. But for the day laborer, this was never true. For him, the corporation is his boss man and his works for him on a day-to-day basis, without security, without tenure, without rights of any kind. The important change that has come about is that most of the Negroes in this part of the state are day laborers, without money, without property, without anything except today's piece of bread and lard. In the wealthy of America today the Negro day laborer has no share. And with the use of more and more machinery he is rapidly becoming permanently without a job, for there is no need for him.

For years the Negro day laborer has received $2.50 or $3.00 for ten hours or more work a day -- in Shaw there has been talk about the wages going down to a $1.75 a day -- and it looks like even this amount will soon be gone. These facts lead to some very, very important questions: First of all, what can these people who are losing their jobs do to change what appears to be a future without a job, housing and food? W What can the MFLU do? What can the MFDP do? Is there any hope at all?

MANUFACTURING

In 1940 about 12 of every 20 workers were working in agriculture,, but by 1960 only four of every 20 workers were working on farms. At the same time, in 1940 about two of every 20 workers worked in industry. By 1960, four of every 20 workers worked in industry. The fact that more and more people are working in industry is more important in this state now than in 1940. This increase in industry is not so important because more people are being employed than in 1940, but because it means that Mississippi is more dependent on the rest of the United States.

Mississippi needs the rest of the country because she needs money from outside the state to buy new products. This is why the state officials are worried about "Mississippi's Image." If the bombings, beatings, demonstrations and the Congressional Challenge continue, industries will not want to come to Mississippi, and people around the country will not buy Mississippi product or come and spend money as tourists in the state. This concern in Mississippi and with "Mississippi's Image" can be seen in a recent aritcle by a columnist in the Jackson Clarion-Ledger: "Yessir, industrialists who are coming to Mississippi say they are proud to come here. To them, the image of our state is such that they are willing and ever eager to stake their future with us."

Both the state and local governments, along with the Mississippi Economic Council, have made tremendous efforts to obtain more manufacturing plants. Aside from advertising the advantages for new industry in their state and local areas, an important part of their effort to get industry to Mississippi has been the Balance Agriculture With Industry Program (BAWI). Under the BAWI program any particular community may look for and attempt to bring in an industry that they want by promising to give the industry a place to build and/or buildings in which to set up, and promising that the new industry will not have to pay certain taxes that in most states they would have to pay. If a company agrees, the community may hold an election to determine whether or not the bonds to pay for the place and/or the building for the new industry should be sold. For the bond issue to pass two-thirds of all the qualified voters who vote at the election must vote for the bond issue.

Needless to say very few Negroes in the state can vote for any bond issue, but they do have to pay the increased taxes need to pay for the bond issue. A result of not being able to vote on the bond issue will be talked about later in this section. In addition to the issuance of bonds, state law permits city governments to let new and expanding firms avoid paying any taxes on their property for a period of ten years. Furthermore, when the city or county government pays for the construction of a new building or buildings for a new industry, the industry does not have to pay taxes as long as the city or county government owns the building. Therefore, in many cases the community not only pays for the building in which the factory is housed, but also the industry does not have to pay any taxes for anything else, like new schools and city improvements, and the people pay the cost of the industry plus all other city expenses.

Now, the question may be asked: Has the BAWI program done what it set out to do? To a certain extent it probably has. Certainly new industry has moved into Mississippi since the program started; however, how much of this came because of the BAWI program is difficult to say. When 1500 factory owners that had just moved into the South were asked what had made them decide to move, it was found that the officials of these companies felt fourteen things were more improtant to them than low taxes and financial aid (e.g. labor supply, market, raw materials, etc.) when they were deciding where to put new plants.

To what extent have the people benefited from the program? Jobs have been provided; however, most of the companies that have used the BAWI program are clothing, textile, or furniture and electrical fixture companies, all of which are kinds of industry that pay low wages. Moreover, the Negro people have not received as many benefits from the BAWI program as the white people. In 1960, only twelve of every 100 of the employed Negro men were working in industry. Furthermore, more than one half of the Negro men who were working in industry were working in the kinds of companies that pay the lowest wages -- furniture, lumber and wood product companies.

This leads to some very important questions: What might happen to the BAWI program if Negroes were allowed to vote? Should the Freedom Democratic Party work to eliminate the BAWI program? Are there ways of providing work for people and still have industry help pay the taxes that the people pay all of now? What are some of the methods that can be used in getting more and better jobs for Negroes in the manufacturing plants? What will be the effect of the increased use of machines rather than men on the problem of more and better jobs?

INCOME

In 1929 in Mississippi most people earned $510 or less in a year, and this amount was less than ½ of what most people in the rest of the country earned in one year. By 1962 in Mississippi most people earned $1259 in a year, which was a little more than one half of what the people in the rest of the country made. Most of the increase in income earned in the rest of the United States was done during World War II. At the end of World War II, Mississippi had a per capita income of almost $1000 a year, which was about one half of what most of the rest of the people in the country earned in a year.

While per capita income in Mississippi went from $500 to almost $1000 in the 15 years between 1929 and 1944, it has grown to only $1240 a year since 1944. This means that the amount of money that most people in Mississippi made in a year increased almost $500 from 1929 to 1944, but in the years since 1944, the amount of money most people in Mississippi made in a year increased only about $250. This information from the Mississippi Economic Council's Booklet, "A Blueprint for Mississippi's Economic Progress" clearly shows that the income of most of the people in the state is not growing larger; income for the people in the rest of the country has grown a great deal while Mississippi's has not. In fact, if the poor, unemployed Negro farm workers had not moved to the northern cities in search of jobs, their tragically low pay would have meant the state would be even poorer than it is now.

It is mostly because of the low farm income that Mississippi has remained so much poorer than the rest of the United States. However, even in industry the wages are much lower than the rest of the nation. In 1963 the usual wage paid per hour for production workers in manufacturing was $1.73 and the normal wages in the rest of the country were $2.46 per hour. A booklet published by the Mississippi Power and Light Company tries to explain the low wages in Mississippi by saying that it is cheaper to live in Mississippi than in other parts of the country. The booklet says:

> " . . . we in Mississippi do not feel that the prevailing wage rates indicate cheap labor. When all factors behind the cost of living are considered, it is felt that the rates are adequate. Some of these factors are: With plenty of garden space, gardens will be found at practically every home supplementing cash income. The cost of rent or the construction cost of a home is less because the same labor costs going into construction is less and the type of construction costs less. Storm windows, basements, and large heating systems are not necessary in this mild climate. Abundance of electricity, natural gas, and water at economical rates. With natural recreational facilities the year-round, this item is also inexpensive. Rural labor will usually consist of wives, sons and daughters of farmers living on the farm and working in the plant. To these families the wages of the plant workers are supplementing farm income and in most cases will mean extra dollars over and above the accustomed existence. Rural labor pool their own transportation and this item is less costly than in large industrial centers."

The above statement reveals two things which have caused the low wages paid in the manufacturing companies. First of all, Mississippi has a large number of very poor farm families from which to get people who are willing to work for very little money because it is all they can get. This cheap labor, together with the BAWI program, has helped to attract the large number of industries which pay low wages into the state. The second reason that wages are low is that most parts of the state are very much against labor unions being organized. This feeling has caused laws like the Right to Work law to be passed in the state legislature. If people were allowed to organize labor unions they could strike and get higher wages. The fact that Mississippi does not like unions, that they want low wages, and that they are proud that the state has poor unions and low wages, is shown by the following statement by the Mississippi Agricultural and Industrial Board, which the governor is the president of:

> "Mississippi has lost a smaller portion of the total working time because of labor strikes and has had fewer strikes and fewer workers involved in strikes relative to employment than the average state in other areas and in the nation. These facts indicate that Mississippi has had labor-management relations which are above average."

The last statement is not true: what these facts do show is that workers are not allowed to organize in Mississippi, and the result is that employers and owners can pay low wages without worrying about the workers getting together to complain.

In 1959, one half of the people in Mississippi made $1204 a year or less; however the usual income per year for white people was $2028, while the Negro average was $724 a year. These facts clearly show that Negroes, for the most part, have not received any benefits from what little industry has come into Mississippi. The Negro men can only get jobs in agriculture, private households -- which includes gardners, chauffeurs, etc. -- and the most menial and lowest paying jobs in industry -- like janitors. The Negro women can only get jobs as maids, cooks and housekeepers, and some jobs on farms. The facts are that there are not even enough decent jobs for the white workers. Therefore, the Negro workers holding poor jobs threaten the white workers, and businessmen and politicians have used this fact to prevent the poor Negroes and poor whites from getting together and working to improve conditions in the state of Mississippi.

This leads to some very important questions: What can be done to increase job opporutnities for Negroes in Mississippi? What can the Freedom Democratic Party do to improve working conditions and increase income? Will it ever be possible for the poor Negroes and poor whites in Mississippi to work together to "overcome" those politicians and businessmen that exploit them both? Is so, how can this be done?

TAXATION

A brief comment on the tax system of Mississippi will further reveal how the politicians and businessmen and the system they work in takes advantage and cheats the people. The facts are that most of the taxes that are paid are not paid by the corporations or wealthy individuals that can most afford them, but upon those families and persons that are poorest and have the least amount of money. The BAWI program has already been described, and it has been shown how the local taxes are not paid by wealthy corporations, but that the people in the community pay the taxes for the industries. Furthermore, some of the communities which have paid for industries in their towns have greatly weakened their ability to borrow money by borrowing too much to pay for industries that do not even pay taxes to help the city pay off its debts. This means that it may be difficult to seal future issues of bonds to pay for new school buildings or other improvements. No wonder this state has such a poor school system.

The fact that the taxes are paid by people who can least afford them can be seen in the following statement in a booklet on government and tax policy put out by the Mississippi Economic Council:

> "Tax policy in Mississippi has, of course, been affected by the relatively low income of the people. It has been necessary to take a relatively higher percent of aggregate income for taxes in order to finance necessary government improvements.

In less complicated language, this means that people in Mississippi have to pay more of what they earn for taxes because the people in the state do not make enough, or as much as people in other states.

> Certain classes of taxpayers, however, have been taxed less heavily than similar classes in a majority of other states. These classes include homeowners and persons in middle and upper-income brackets. Other important features of tax policy include heavy reliance on consumptive and provision of tax inducements for industrial location."

Again, the people who make the least amount of money are responsible for more than their share of the taxes.

> The general sales and use tax-accounting for about one half of the state general fund revenues has been the most important source of tax revenue. Other state taxes, ranked according to revenue yield in fiscal year of 1960 are motor fuels, corporation taxes, tobacco tax, oil and gas severence, and individual income."

One question stands out from all these facts: What should be the Freedom Democratic Party position on how people and industries are taxed, and what does the FDP feel is fair taxing.

SUMMARY

The politicians and usinessmen talk about "Mississippi's Image"; they continually refer to a "New Mississippi." But is it any different from the Old Mississippi? The only possible answer to that question is No. The ways people are kept poor may be more hidden and harder to understand than before; it may look like a good system on the surface; it may seem to provide more for the people of the state--new factories, new highways, new schools, new buildings --but basically it is the same old Mississippi. What can be done to change all of this?

Temporary:
Education, University of Georgia
Civil War Centennial

Shepherded by police, a group of seven Brooklyn CORE pickets leave 67th Precinct Station singing We Shall Overcome. They finally did after bitter fight against baking company.

CIVIL RIGHTS BATTLE: NORTHERN STYLE

Ebony March 1963

IN BROOKLYN last fall, Ebinger Baking Company executives crumbled like cake after a determined year long campaign of Brooklyn CORE (Congress of Racial Equality) which won almost immediate hiring of 12 Negro and Puerto Rican saleswomen. Frosting sweet was a company promise of an additional 28 saleswomen within a year making a total of 40 out of a 240 woman sales force.

The bakery battle began in 1961 when CORE learned Ebinger's had no Negro or Puerto Rican salespeople in any of its 44 stores, no drivers and no Negroes in the skilled trades of the baking division although 40 per cent of the division's employes were Negro. CORE's smart cookies, dedicated young Brooklynites, swung into action—seeking negotiations first which the company adamantly refused. Picketing and leaflet distribution then began and continued unremittingly around the entire chain for nearly a year.

In early August, CORE mobilized all metropolitan CORE chapters in a massive non-violent resistance demonstration characteristic of the group's goodwill methods. On a busy Saturday, over 125 members and friends picketed 34 stores in a six hour period and not a punch or a pie was thrown. Company sales plummeted as hundreds of passersby expressed approval and 3,800 took time to sign pledges not to buy at Ebinger's.

The climax came a week later with a sit-down by seven Brooklyn CORE members in the bakery's truck driveway. The sit-downers were arrested but the press, radio and TV gave the demonstration full coverage. Melting under the increasing heat in the kitchen, Ebinger executives capitulated and sat down to talk. Nowadays in Brooklyn at Ebinger's, when they know CORE is coming, they bake a cake, and make sure a Negro or Puerto Rican girl is there to sell it.

Nothing moved at the bakery, not even jellyrolls and raspberry twists when Ebinger trucks were stopped by CORE's Barbara Weeks, Claire Toombs calmly sitting in drive.

Bloodless battle of bakery almost becomes ballet as CORE member Miss Toombs, a secretary, is lifted from pavement and carried away by police—giving baker's men temporary victory.

Up in arms, but literally, Mrs. Weeks, a housewife, takes policeman's carry with disdain.

Arrest holds no terror for CORE's Dr. Barbara Wallace or any others of well-trained group.

CORE leader Ben Brown epitomizes the courteous, non-violent, determined tactics of CORE.

Blocking driveway, CORE pickets Eduardo Standard and Rioghan Kirchner prevent deliveries to branch stores. Boycott as racial technique gained impetus from successful use in Montgomery, Ala. bus controversy, spread over U. S.

The message was the same in Spanish, too: "Here we cannot work. Then don't buy!". CORE fight had full support of mixed Spanish-speaking, Negro community. Puerto Ricans in big cities face same discrimination as Negroes.

Pat-a-cake brigade joins fight as kids get in the act with placards like one in middle above: "Ebinger's takes dimes for cakes from us. But gives no jobs." Many CORE parents teach children early that even the young should join fight against bias.

Among first Negro job applicants, Anna Walker is interviewed by Ebinger personnel chief Trinneer after community protest overpowered bakery bias.

On the job, Miss Walker sells baked goods to a customer in Ebinger main store in Brooklyn. After winning year-long employment campaign, CORE spokesman Brown said: "The project was wound up in a spirit of reconciliation."

Sweeping up by Lloyd Hodges, Ebinger Co. porter, is final tableau in real life drama enacted on Brooklyn's busy streets. The bitter battle was over and a baker had learned a new recipe for sales ladyfingers after a year of lessons.

America has the best news coverage in the world. Unfortunately, however, much reporting is under the pressure of narrow provincialism and our traditional prejudices. Thus political fanaticism and military extremism frequently threatens sound democratic practice and a rational defense system. Between The Lines seeks to provide greater insight on major issues by presenting selected reports, research analyses and forecasts, drawn from the most authoritative sources at home and abroad, dealing with the issues of war and peace, science, religion, education, economics, race and industrial relations. This effort is dedicated to the belief that only through the Judaic-Christian concepts of truth can we avoid the violent changes inherent in war, communism and fascism. Only thus can we move forward out of the tribalism of man towards the brotherhood of the Kingdom of God. Anything less will be dangerously inadequate in the nuclear age.

X-Ray and Forecast: Prejudice Is Not A Little Sin

JUST as Socrates taught that virtue is wisdom, so may we see how the evil of prejudice makes fools of men in areas of racial strife. In gleaning information from Southern Negro leaders — educators, clergymen, lawyers, businessmen — this Newsletter had uncovered the place where constructive White-Negro community relations seems to have been derailed. This place of derailment needs to be carefully examined, for countless communities, North and South, still must seek solutions for racial tensions in housing, job opportunities and other areas, including, we regret to add, in the churches.

SINCE WORLD WAR II great advances have been made in Negro education. Negro colleges and universities have poured out thousands of able, trained and ambitious Negro youth who have made impressive contributions to the nation's literature, music, art and drama — not to mention their overwhelming leadership in sports. A new personal and racial pride, along with an eagerness for further achievement, has naturally arisen among them. But this proud, eager and skilled new generation of Negroes have encountered an arrogant prejudice that would push them all back indiscriminately into the swamplands of the "Uncle Tom's Cabin niggers" of the past. The able young Negro of today simply will not accept this fate.

The responsible young Negro also refuses to be classified with the Negro criminal element of our cities. (See "Crime and Race," col. 2, p. 4.) Negro leaders consider this urban situation the end result of long-time discrimination in education, job privileges and housing.

NEGRO LEADERS SAY that had the doors been open (in education, employment, housing, restaurants, churches) for the able, responsible Negroes of good reputation, who still constitute a comparatively small minority of their race, then the pressures for complete integration would not have accumulated. Negroes of ability and character would be mingling freely in all stratas of our society today, while the great mass of Negroes would still be content in their own environment — for before them would be open doors of opportunity by which they could better themselves if they prepared for it.

Comparatively few Negro high schools in the South, for instance, have adequate facilities for teaching the sciences — chemistry, biology, etc. On the outside they may look "just as good or better" than the white schools, but invariably the laboratory equipment is inadequate and skimpy, often the teachers poorly qualified. As a result few Negro students have had sufficient background in science by the time they reach the university level to qualify them for pre-med or engineering courses.

TWO ERUPTING FORCES must now be met as a result of the efforts of white society to keep all Negroes "in their place" as second class citizens in both North and South:

- THE FIRST FORCE is the mass discontent now stirred up among all Negroes, most of whom would have largely remained content with their limited privileges since they have limited outlooks and abilities. But they have seen their most able, moderate and reasonable leaders humiliated, assaulted and jailed by white officials, and their most attractive and outstanding youths brutally beaten, set upon by police dogs, jailed and imprisoned for engaging in well-mannered, non-violent demonstrations. Therefore all Negroes of all levels of life are now aroused and embittered to the extent that it will take far more concessions on the part of white society to pacify them than would have been the case if reasonable concession had been made to the reasonable demands of the responsible, moderate Negro leaders. The White Supremacy extremists, symbolized by the white idiots in uniform inciting trained dogs to savagely attack unarmed teen-age Negro marchers, will long penalize the white man.

- THE SECOND FORCE, already towering in the background, is the specter of Negro organizations and Negro leaders dedicated to extreme violent measures, rather than the well-mannered, non-violent, Christian-motivated methods of the present Negro leadership. This threat is already apparent in the Black Muslim movement which repudiates and scorns the moderate Christian Negro leadership, symbolized by Martin Luther King, and proposes to deal with all white men on the same terms and with the same methods as the white extremists have used against the Negro. This would mean race war. We have been skirting on the edge of such conditions in Mississippi, Alabama and other areas. (The FBI has infiltrated the Black Muslims to keep watch over them.)

THE BLAME for these conditions, according to most social scientists, rests on the failure of moderate and liberal white community leaders to speak up and take a stand — in time. Thus they have left the initiative to the extremists. Washington newsmen point out that no Senator from the South — with the possible exception of Sen. Tower of Texas — has made a public statement denouncing the white extremists in his own or other Southern states; none has been willing to impair his political future by putting himself on record on this question, although it has been demonstrated repeatedly that when a few white citizens of prominence do speak out and take a stand, the white supremacy extremists soon retreat to the back woods.

Unfortunately, it was not until the week after the violence at the Univ. of Miss. that the "Committee of 100" Mississippi business and professional men came out for the enforcement of law and order, even though it meant accepting the principle of integration. Editorial comments appearing widely suggested that, had the committee so spoken a week earlier, the violence would have been averted. As it was, there were no barriers raised by local citizens of influence in Mississippi against the extremists. They were there, but they did not speak out.

THE FAILURE OF THE CHURCHES during recent racial strife is causing much damage to Christianity throughout the world, especially in Africa and Asia, at a time when Christianity is already in retreat before the resurgence of Mohammedanism. A realistic Southern newsman, Ralph McGill, editor and publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, states that the white churches of the South continue to be the single greatest road block to racial progress. In Birmingham, only 14 or 15 white churches have accepted well-dressed, reverent Negro worshipers, while hundreds of other white churches barred all Negroes from worshiping in their sanctuaries. McGill accuses these churches of having made "bouncers of their ushers." Yet most of these evangelistic white Protestant churches maintain missionaries in Africa to preach that "God is love" and that "all men are brothers" in Christianity! McGill believes the churches could have prevented all the strife had they taken a firm and moderate stand for racial brotherhood early in the evolving crisis. (N.Y. Herald Tribune, May 5.) Of course there would have been penalties; churches, clergymen and laymen would have suffered for their belief in brotherhood. But is that not the church's mission, that Christians suffer for truth and love to prevent much greater suffering and to lead all humanity towards the Kingdom of God?

THE LARGER LESSON: This demonstration of how prejudice distorts human judgment and moral values recalls parallels in history. It was the spirit of prejudice and revenge against the Germans which helped to strangle the moderate and democratic Weimar Republic after World War I. The ensuing frustrations and despair among a new generation of young Germans opened the way for Hitler and Nazism. And it was racial prejudice in the West that kept a tight economic stranglehold on Japan in the 1930's and discredited the moderate Japanese Christian statesmen who had sought reasonable concessions from the West — thus turning loose upon the world the Japanese military extremists. Prejudice is not a little sin.

UN PEACE FORCE — TO GROW OR TO DIE?

THE announcement that representatives of the Latin American nations in the Organization of American States are planning to create an OAS Armed Peace Force, patterned after the United Nations Emergency Forces serving in the Mideast and in the Congo, strongly reaffirms the principle of international authority to maintain the peace. An OAS Peace Force could be used in such tension areas as the Dominican-Haitian frontier and to stabilize and supervise the re-establishment of new governments — when, for instance, the present corrupt Duvalier tyranny collapses in Haiti. The U.S. strongly supports the OAS Peace Force idea, for the plan would greatly facilitate handling the Cuban problem, since it would provide the necessary peace-making and law enforcement agencies needed to fill the vacuum created should Castro be overthrown. U.S. military forces would not then be required.

ANOTHER BOOST to the UN is the decision by Denmark, Norway and Sweden to establish a 3,000-man force (later to be 20,000) that would be available to the UN whenever and wherever needed. The Scandinavian countries will maintain these forces at their own expense until called into the UN's service. Several other countries are considering similar action. There is a strong likelihood therefore that a much expanded UN Emergency Force will be brought into being, as one of mankind's most important steps forward. These developments spring from the relief and enthusiasm expressed throughout the world over the continued stabilization of the Congo under the UN's auspices — one of the great achievements of modern times, for otherwise unlimited chaos would still reign in the Congo, infecting all of Africa. The foreign press has been full of these encouraging sentiments — by contrast to much of the U.S. press which, with its anti-UN bias, often skims over the good news about the UN.

THE UN PEACE FORCE, however, is in jeopardy, despite these hopeful trends, since 46 countries out of the 110 member states have paid nothing for the UN Emergency Force expenses in the Congo, and 24 have not paid their apportionment for the UN peace-keeping action in the Middle East. The total amount owed the UN is about $100 million, of which $63 million is owed by the Soviet bloc and $14 by France, so aside from the default by the Communists, the margin is not too serious. Several countries have paid up since May 1, with the forecast that only a few outside the Soviet bloc will not pay — Portugal, Spain, France and others that still have colonial interests. The Security Council will do all possible to implement the World Court judgment that the UN has the authority to make members pay or deny them voting rights.

There is, on the other hand, a considerable feeling in Washington and other Western capitals that with the growing strength of the international peace force principle, it would be better to strengthen and expand the UN Emergency Force and let the nations refusing their support bear the stigma of their defaults. Each time their representatives rise to speak before the General Assembly or the Security Council, the shadows of their defaults also rise to haunt them and weaken their influence. Already the Russians are squirming and insisting that they would pay if the peace force action had been ordered by the Security Council — where the U.S.S.R. could use its veto, as it has done about 100 times! So while the principle of an international police force is in danger on paper in the UN, the reality is gaining strength daily.

PARTY politics have forced the Kennedy Administration's Cuban policy underground since the GOP stalwarts and the military extremists are so prone to call anything less than military action against Cuba "appeasement." But with the Cuban exiles irreparably split and given to irresponsible adventures, the U.S. can no longer even furnish them arms. Consequently the Administration has been compelled to turn towards non-military means of dealing with Castro. At the present time this consists chiefly of secret aid to anti-Castro forces carrying on guerrilla operations in Cuba and a close surveillance over any attempt by Castro to export his revolution, which would be met with armed resistance by the victim country, with U.S. military support. Also pressure on the economic blockade of Cuba is increasing, thereby forcing the U.S.S.R. to spoonfeed the island's economy at a cost of over a million dollars per day. Aside from this the Administration looks to long-range remedial efforts to prevent Communist-oriented revolutions from erupting elsewhere, for U.S. military intervention is no longer feasible in Latin America.

U.S. MILITARY INTERVENTIONS in the past have inflamed the most foul spots on the Latin American map. The late Trujillo of the Dominican Republic, the Samozas of Nicaragua and the Duvalier tyranny in Haiti . . . all these have followed occupation by the U.S.

Where We Failed

Marines. When we intervene or support these military regimes, we become responsible for them but can't control them. Not only in this hemisphere but in Korea, Formosa, Vietnam, Thailand and Spain, we have become identified with largely corrupt military dictatorships. This is the source of most of the anti-Yankeeism in Latin America. For us to seek to cure Castro by military intervention would therefore create antagonisms and resistance that would leave us with no workable policy in this hemisphere.

THE ALLIANCE FOR PROGRESS — the backbone of the Kennedy policy for Latin America — has made slow headway. This greatly complicates the situation for the Administration since the success of the Alliance can't yet be publicized as an alternative for the more aggressive military policy which many GOP critics and extremists demand. But the Alliance has not failed, although it has been necessary to change its methods and aims. Alliance leaders had previously assumed that the Castro revolution would sufficiently frighten the rich oligarchies in Latin American countries until they would accept the land and tax reforms which must precede economic progress.

But the rich families have manifested little change in attitude. For the most part they have left their huge land holdings in the care of their political hirelings and transferred their cash accumulations to Swiss banks while they hide out in the fashionable resorts of Europe. Since most Latin American politicians owe their support to these rich oligarchies, they will do little to legally promote tax reform and land reform. Hence violent revolution would seem to be the only alternative, and such upheavals are already smoldering in Brazil, Ecuador, Peru, Guatemala, Nicaragua. The U.S. policy now is to avoid revolutions by encouraging constructive changes — but can the changes come in time? There is encouragement in the gains the Alliance has made in Colombia and Chile where local conditions have been propitious.

SIGNIFICANT CHANGES, moreover, are taking place within the Alliance for Progress which will have wide influence on the whole concept of foreign aid and the efforts to bring economic progress to underdeveloped countries. First, it should be recognized that U.S. officialdom has never been exactly honest about foreign aid — and this goes for the recent report on foreign aid by the Kennedy-appointed commission under General Clay. Most U.S. foreign aid has had direct or indirect military ties. And generals and admirals do not get medals for economic achievements. When our military chiefs have gone into an area — Spain, Thailand, Formosa, Greece, Laos or Vietnam — they have received medals for "getting things done" and they've used whatever native leadership available, usually a wide assortment of corrupt politicians, fast-buck business interests and plain crooks. Anybody who spoke English was in.

Such foreign aid may have achieved some political and military gains for Washington — although much of this has been temporary. But in the process the rich got richer, the crooks became millionaires, and the people became even more impoverished. One day spent by an inquiring person beyond the good-wage radius of our U.S. bases in any of the above countries will provide abundant and sickening evidence of this situation. Even when U.S. foreign aid has been free of military ties it has often been so politically motivated that the assistance became a kind of bribe with the recipients feeling little obligation to the U.S. While more benefits accrued to the people in these instances than from straight military aid, the native political leaders and established business interests benefited first and most.

THE NEW CONCEPT OF AID being worked out through the Alliance for Progress begins and stays with the people. The Alliance is adhering to the principle that without adequate education, health and basic opportunities for all, there can be no lasting progress. Even land reform means little until the illiterate peasants who receive the land are taught something about modern farming. Tax reform will benefit little unless there are capable and honest officials and civil servants to administer it. So all these projects, along with education and public health (which includes medical clinics, supplies of good water, roads, the draining of infestuous swamps) must come first — and be set up in full cooperation with local governments. And since graft and corruption cannot thrive on such frugal down-to-the-people programs, effective cooperation with local governments is much more readily secured.

THE SUCCESS OF THE PEACE CORPS, whose teams of dedicated young people accomplish more with pennies than diplomats, generals and admirals can do with millions, is strongly influencing aid concepts. In this same spirit the universities and colleges of California, for instance, are carrying out very successful projects in agriculture, mining and forestry in Chile — the two states having similar geographical situations. The Alliance is organizing other such state-to-state aid programs. Alliance directors are also planning to organize teams of U.S. businessmen to devote a year to the Alliance in selected localities, helping to start new businesses and industries in their particular field of experience — a kind of senior Peace Corps. Many other new and promising plans are shaping up.

AS WITH THE PEACE CORPS, almost every phase of these developments can be traced back to the work of Christian missions. In fact, it will be recalled that the Peace Corps, after a faltering start, was reorganized under the guidance of veteran American missionary leaders who were called in by our Government. The principle of Christian missions — that love and dedicated lives count much more than money — is slowly permeating the areas of official life where profligacy, military expediency and political fanaticism in our international relations have cost us billions and gained us very little. Did someone say the day of Christian missions was over? The redemptive power of love will never become obsolete.

Our Economic Pyramid – Cracks at the Bottom

The U.S. economy continues to move deeper into a unique era of abounding prosperity at the top and growing crises at the bottom. Will the prosperity permeate downward enough to ameliorate the crises or will the crises break up the prosperity?

The talk in business circles about the "profit squeeze" is pure fiction as far as the large corporations are concerned which dominate U.S. industrial production. Corporation profits for the first quarter of 1963 average about 3 per cent higher than the average profits for 1962 which were the highest on record. (Wall St. Journal, April 29.) The real profit squeeze is on small businesses. With administered prices now prevailing in most industries, profits of 12 to 20 per cent on investment are common in the large industries, while the small businessman is lucky to make 6 per cent on his investment, above his own salary. (Administered pricing is the fixing of prices arbitrarily, irrespective of the laws of supply and demand which were traditionally the heart of the free enterprise system. Autos, steel, chemicals, rubber and many other products are largely so priced today.)

There is little doubt that the large corporations are prospering from the immense savings in labor costs accruing from new automated processes. Whereas the little businessman gets much less advantage from automation for he, like the small farmer, seldom has the volume or capital for automation equipment. So the small businessman, the worker displaced by automation and the small farmer, being crowded off his land by the more efficient bigger operator, create the crises at the bottom of our economic pyramid.

The White Collar Worker is now being hit by automation which will continue in an ever-widening swath. Insurance companies, banks, department stores, etc., have cut their clerical staffs from 5 to 15 per cent in the past few months. (U.S. News & World Report, May 13.) Even voices of big business are conceding this, although they evade the issue as much as possible. But it is freely discussed among the economists.

The hardest to be hit in the coming months will be the high school graduates, for jobs for the unskilled will be increasingly scarce. Already, it's much easier for a woman to get a job than a man in several industrial areas because the machines displace the men, and women can be trained for automation control jobs — and hired for less. (The recent Federal legislation on equal pay for women will probably be evaded for a long time through various "classification" gimmicks.)

Strikes Vs. The Miracle: Peak moments of strife are coming up as soon as automation leaps forward in railroads, steel, autos and other industries. A nationwide rail strike is in the offing; labor contracts are facing renegotiation in steel, autos, electric manufacturing and other lines. And these threatened strikes all focus on job security. "Featherbedding" in the vocabulary of management . . . . "job protection" in the language of the worker. Unless there is a miracle there will soon be some angry and costly strikes. A miracle stands by, waiting to deliver us, however, if management has the vision to see it.

Kaiser Steel and American Motors have successfully inaugurated profit-sharing plans geared to the problems of automation and job security. Kaiser employees have drawn a bonus of $80. a month per worker, American Motors employees a yearly dividend of similar proportions. This in addition to retraining and replacement programs for displaced workers. Enlightened labor leaders are pushing similar plans in other giant industries.

Unfortunately most big business management looks with jaundiced eyes on these progressive solutions despite the demonstrations of success. There is no reason why the Kaiser and American Motors plans cannot be adopted by other industries, including big steel and railroads. Of one thing you may be sure — the cure and the deepening crisis are spread out very clearly before our eyes at this point, and each new step taken forward or backward, in cooperative goodwill or vindictive bitterness, will make its contribution to our future.

(These varied profit-sharing plans at best only provide "lay-off protection" in industries that are automating. They don't solve the problem of the increasing numbers of new workers coming on the labor market each year. But they do promise a respite from bitter strikes at this crucial period, and time for natural adjustments to be worked out.)

"What Can I Do?"

Those who wonder how much influence their letters to political leaders or to newspapers have on important issues should always remember that in our democracy, public opinion guides or checks policy. There have been many instances in American history when a President dared not act until the public was ready to support his move. Political leaders always have a careful score kept of the mail on various issues. Newspapers quickly respond to complaints or praise of a feature — judge public opinion by the mail received. TV-radio and sponsors will dump an expensive program if there are enough complaints — or keep a program that has public support.

The lobbies are heard from regularly — are you?

Frances E. Layer missed her active participation in peace organizations when her husband retired and they started traveling around the country in a trailer. Then she hit upon the idea of writing letters on the subject of world peace — to editors, government officials, heads of various organizations. Wherever she goes, she writes to the leading paper in the town; she also writes regularly to the N.Y. Times and the Christian Science Monitor because of their international circulation. Her approach is non-partisan; her letters are factual and brief. She also corresponds with others who are interested in becoming effective letter writers. From time to time she sends them copies of her letters, with suggested names of people and editors to write to. She wisely advises that her letters not be used verbatim but only as guides. Her permanent mail address is Box 448, Warren, Ohio.

Dr. and Mrs. Carlton Brehmer of Sheboygan, Wis., send post cards to TV stations and sponsors when they see something they feel should be protested — or praised. Recently they have been concentrating on protesting the TV cigarette ads slanted towards young people.

A useful circular, How-To-Write A Letter To The Editor, is published by the Friends Committee on National Legislation, 245 Second St., N.E., Washington 2, D.C. A copy is available for 10¢ (available in quantity at special rates).

Jobs For Prisoners

Although the prison population in most states is growing rapidly, the prison population in North Carolina is diminishing. From an all-time high of 12,000 just two years ago, North Carolina's prisoners today number fewer than 11,000, which is 3,000 below the number anticipated in a projection of the state's overall population growth.

This decrease has been achieved by a multiple attack against the antiquated prison system which formerly prevailed in North Carolina as in most states. G. W. Randall, Director of Prisons, commented, "Crime in the nation is growing four times faster than the population. That shows the old ways don't work. We just had to do something else."

North Carolina's overall program is based on preparing the prisoners for release through effective rehabilitation that includes vocational and literacy training, mental and alcoholic clinics, work-release plans. The new program will save North Carolina $800,000. this year alone, and the budget request for the next two years is $1.25 million less than had been anticipated.

"But more important than saving tax dollars," continues Randall, "is the incalculable saving of human suffering. There is no way to measure the waste, heartaches and human misery caused by crime."

Here is how North Carolina's prison program works: School attendance is required for all inmates who have less than fourth grade achievement levels. "The link between crime and lack of education is irrefutable. Of 541 youthful felons that we have, 512 were school drop-outs." Prisoners are encouraged to go beyond the fourth grade and many have achieved the equivalent of a high school certificate.

The alcoholic rehabilitation plan invites Alcoholics Anonymous groups to take their program into various prisons. "About 75 per cent of our inmates are here because of an alcohol problem." The record of the inmates participating in the voluntary alcoholic rehabilitation program has been closely followed after release by prison officials. Of those studied, 2000 have remained in free society and continue to participate in Alcoholics Anonymous, while about 345 failed and came back to prison.

The Work-Release Plan is probably the most important as well as the most experimental part of North Carolina's program. Selected prisoners who are serving five years or less are permitted to work in the free community during working hours. During non-working hours they go back to the prison. The money they earn pays the Prison Dept. for their cells, meals and transportation to and from work, supports their families and the balance goes into a savings account payable on their release. Many prisoners accumulate as much as $2000. in savings. Some use the money for down payments on new homes. A welder, serving five years for breaking and entering, used his savings to start his own business.

A printer with a wife and two children worked three and a half months, earned $1075., less taxes and social security; he paid $229. to the prison for his housing and board, spent $53. on transportation to his job, contributed $750. to the support of his family and had $43. in savings. A bricklayer on a construction job earns $3. an hour, supports his wife and two children.

About 20 per cent of the 8000 prisoners now serving five years or less have been approved for the work-release program. Only about five per cent of those who start it are withdrawn for violations. (Most violations fall into a category of taking a drink or slipping off to see their wives.) Many inmates work for former employees. Others, who learn a trade in prison and are accepted for the work-release program, are shifted to prisons near their employment.

There are more than 1400 job-holders in the North Carolina prison system who pay their way through prison, support their families and accumulate savings. The work-release plan not only keeps the prisoner's dependents off the welfare rolls, but in addition provides him with a job on release and so he is not forced back into crime. Thus he has an incentive to make a good record.

At first the public was dubious about the work-release program but Randall explains, "People forget that 97 per cent of our prisoners are going to be released. We simply ask: Is it better to come out with a job and self respect and contribute to society, or to come out with nothing?"

Note

Crime and Race

We hear much about the increase of crime in the big cities and the high percentage that is committed by Negroes. But Police Chief R. V. Murray of Washington, D.C., where the crime situation has been especially distressing recently, reports that while 85 per cent of the crime of Washington is committed by Negroes, at least 85 per cent of the victims of these crimes are also Negroes. "My records show that in the categories of homicides, rape, aggravated assault, Negroes are victims in 85 per cent of the cases and in robbery they are the victims in 70 per cent of the cases."

Note:

Illiteracy and Relief

In Chicago an educational program for adult illiterates has uncovered the startling relationship between unemployment, the relief rolls and literacy. This city found that at least half of greater Chicago's 50,000 able-bodied relief recipients were functionally illiterate (unable to read a want ad or fill out a job application).

Some 7,600 of Chicago's relief recipients were enlisted recently in an adult education effort to give them the basic 3-R education — reading, writing and arithmetic — which they missed as children. The program was started just one year ago with 225 volunteer teachers but it is already attracting the attention of welfare officials in many other cities. For the costly job-retraining program supported by heavy Federal aid cannot benefit the thousands of illiterates who have lost their jobs; they simply don't qualify for most types of training.

The Chicago system was started on a compulsory basis with the 7,600 relief recipients required to attend two evening classes a week, each two hours long, or they would lose their relief checks. "You cut classes and we cut your checks," were the orders. But the compulsory factor has rarely had to be enforced. Relief authorities were surprised to find most of the group not only willing but eager to attend, and many others on relief rolls who have heard of the program are applying for the privilege of joining the project.

The teachers in the literacy school point out that, besides the employment potentials involved, the school often helps make attenders into more reliable and conscientious parents; many parents rejoice in the new privilege and comment, "No kid of mine will ever drop out of school." Said one former cotton picker, "I feel like a caged bird that all of a sudden got out and is free." Being able to read and write enables the jobless to get jobs at higher-than-menial levels and to qualify for job training.

The oldest part of the Chicago program is job training which is carried on in an old 5-story wooden warehouse. About 20 vocations are taught, including spray painting, metal drilling, glass cutting, running power sewing machines, etc. Over 13,000 are enrolled at the training center and last year the center found jobs for over 12,000 relief recipients after basic job training.

The Birchers In Politics

The extreme right-wing organizations, such as the John Birchers, are concentrating their efforts on gaining political control in the states of small population such as Wyoming, Montana, Utah and Nevada, according to Sen. Gale W. McGee (D., Wyo.), who taught U.S. history for 22 years and made a study of this situation in his home state of Wyoming. The Birch Society there has collected funds from chapters all over America to defeat McGee because of his liberal views.

In such states as Wyoming and Montana, the Senator points out, a political dollar goes further because you only have to reach 140,000 voters compared with seven million in New York. Thus the Birchers are concentrating their funds on these areas where they can get results. Sen. Frank Moss (D., Utah) is also up for re-election next year and is already under fire by the right-wing groups who are contributing heavily to the campaign funds of his opponents (selected for their right-wing views). In Idaho last year, Sen. Frank Church was marked for defeat but won despite nationwide Birch support of his opponent.

In Utah Reed Benson, eldest son of former Sec. of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson, serves as a paid coordinator of the John Birch Society at a salary of $12,000. a year. He directs Birch activities through volunteer leaders of local chapters of 10 to 15 members each. The younger Benson states that membership in Utah has tripled since he started work six months ago, although in accordance with the Society's policies he declines to reveal its total membership. In 1962 Reed Benson unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for Congress.

Ezra Taft Benson said of his son's affiliation with the Birch Society, "I admire Reed's courage and applaud his decision," adding however that he is not himself a member. The elder Benson has been in the middle of a Mormon dispute over the church's position on the Birch Society. This has ranged during recent months from neutrality to hostility to neutrality again.

The Birch Society is strong enough in Wyoming to dominate the legislature this year which voted to abolish the Federal income tax, to get the U.S. out of the United Nations; it also passed legislation that clears the way for the state to over-ride the authority of the Supreme Court! If the right-wing fanatics can capture enough of these small-population states, they will get power in the U.S. Senate all out of proportion to their numbers and might even get laws passed that would never receive support of the thickly settled areas of the country.

THE DEEPENING CRISIS . . . NO. 2

Racial Unrest: A Time Bomb With Fuse Lit

Editor's Note: Will current racial strife in America be limited to sporadic outbreaks or are we, in this turbulent summer of 1963, on the verge of major domestic violence? Here, in the second installment of a special series on the deepening integration crisis, is an on-the-spot survey of major friction spots.

By BERNARD GAVZER
Associated Press Writer

Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson has warned that "a time bomb ticks" in America's streets this turbulent summer of 1963.

The bomb is the explosive crisis which already has flared in sporadic violence in Danville, Va., Cambridge, Md., and New York as Negroes and whites have clashed on the issue of full racial equality now.

Overhanging these and other outbreaks are the haunting questions: Will the bomb go off? When? How? Where?

Interviews with and reports from top level white and Negro officials in federal, state and municipal governments, with civic, social and religious leaders and with citizens in the street, point to one conclusion:

There is grave danger of major racial violence as America searches for a solution to the deepening integration crises.

IF SUCH chaos comes, the consensus is:

1. It may very likely—but not necessarily—occur in a Northern big city.

2. It may stem from rigid police action—or from some minor incident blown out of proportion by rumor.

Viewing the state of affairs today, the National Urban League's Board of Trustees reports:

"Hundreds of thousands of (Northern) Negro citizens—struggling beneath the mounting burden of automation, over-crowding and subtle discrimination—are reaching the breaking point."

Dr. Gardner Taylor, Negro pastor of Brooklyn's Concord Baptist Church, warns:

"Miscalculation of the moment of truth which is upon us could plunge New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Chicago, Detroit and Los Angeles into a crimson carnage and a bloodbath unparalleled in the history of the nation."

ONE OF THE worst years in the history of U.S. race relations was 1919. There were seven major riots that year—the three worst occurring in Chicago (38 killed, 537 wounded and injured), Washington, D.C. (6 killed, scores hurt), and Phillips County, Ark. (30 killed, hundreds hurt).

Can such riots come again?

Dr. Kenneth Clark, Negro professor at City College of New York, answers:

"If white America refuses to grant rights to Negro citizens and continues to withhold them, I suppose white America will try killing Negroes. If white America is prepared to see Negroes being killed and killed and killed, then this will happen, but it won't stop anything because you simply cannot kill everyone."

In Chicago, veteran labor leader Ralph Helstein, president of the United Packinghouse Workers—a union which has been integrated for decades—says:

"My feeling is that the discontent still is below the boiling point, but I wouldn't bet a thin dime on when it boils over. Our organizers throughout the country are surprised that it hasn't boiled over."

IF THE time bomb should go off, where is it likely to explode?

Some, including Dr. Richard Wade, professor of urban history at the University of Chicago, think it may occur in the South.

Wade cites a long history of deference on the part of the Negro, who is in many Southern regions unskilled, uneducated and has little organization.

Others believe the explosion is more likely to occur in the North where there is job discrimination, de facto segregation in housing, de facto school segregation and social discrimination.

Speaking of the onslaughts to personal dignity endured by the Negro in the North, a Negro public relations man notes:

"I sit in my air conditioned office all day and I see nicely dressed people and I look down on Sixth Avenue and I almost for-

Speaking of the onslaughts to personal dignity endured by the Negro in the North, a Negro public relations man notes:

"I sit in my air conditioned office all day and I see nicely dressed people and I look down on Sixth Avenue and I almost forget about color. And then at 5:30 I get downstairs and it hits me in the face. I can't get a cab because everybody thinks I want to go up to Harlem."

IN CHICAGO, Alvin Prejean, deputy director of the Urban League, insists all the ingredients for explosion are to be found in Chicago, among other Northern cities.

"Negroes are pushing and whites are pushing back," he says. "People here used to talk about those poor people down in Birmingham. Now they are talking about here. We need better teachers, better jobs, better housing just to catch up with whites."

Earl Brown, Manhattan's Negro deputy borough president and former magazine writer who with Louis E. Martin, now a member of the Democratic National Committee, predicted the 1943 Detroit race riot (34 dead, 700 injured), says it is the discovery of obtaining dignity which contributes to the Negro militancy.

"This is the Negro doing something for himself," Brown says. "He's learning something about dignity. He may have to lose some blood, but he's found that that's the road to freedom, not just winning a peace."

Martin, former editor-publisher of Detroit's Negro newspaper, the Michigan Chronicle, says:

"Today, everybody recognizes the danger. In 1943, nobody would believe it.

"For once in America, the issue is on top of the table. There are no illusions. The confrontations that have taken place are vital because the Negro now knows he is being listened to."

AS IN ANY social movement, there is confusion. Leaders struggle for power positions, goals depend upon who's defining them, control of the masses evaporates.

James Meredith gets booed at an NAACP convention in Chicago, for example. At the same convention, Dr. J. H. Jackson, president of the National (Negro) Baptist Convention, is booed for 9 minutes, supposedly because he backed President Kennedy's call for a moratorium on demonstrations.

On leaving the speaker's platform, Rev. Jackson was pinned against it by some 50 persons who kept crying, "Kill him! Kill him!"

The mood for action is all-pervading. Its beat is sounded by Dr. James M. Nabrit Jr., president of Howard University:

"We are sick of evasions, weary of excuses, fed up with promises and want action now, liberty now, equality now."

C. Summer Stone Jr., editor of the Washington (D.C.) Afro-American, says, "There is a new Negro out there somewhere. For the first time, I'd say, everybody is involved. All Negroes, except for some Uncle Toms, are prepared to be involved."

THERE IS concern that the one thing which might lead to trouble would be a mass nonviolent march on Washington.

Such a march was decided upon in New York recently at a top level strategy meeting involving the NAACP's Roy Wilkins, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's Martin Luther King Jr., the Urban League's Whitney Young, CORE's James Farmer, the Students Non-Violent Coordinating Committee's John Lewis and A. Philip Randolph, president of the Negro American Labor Council.

The march is set for Aug. 28. It was decided upon even though the Kennedy administration has voiced vigorous determination to get a strong civil rights bill through Congress. Negro leaders feel there will be a filibuster and that a march would show lawmakers the degree of Negro unity and determination.

While there may be argument about the length of the fuse or whether it will be ignited, the authorities who must plan for any eventuality have done so in many areas. It is clear the federal government is committed to back decisions of courts and policies of the administration with armed troops.

"If there is runaway rioting—I hope there won't be—then the Negro can't help but lose," says Lee Blackwell, editor of the Chicago Defender.

"We represent only 10 per cent of the population. We couldn't win. I don't think it will happen that way because the Negro is realistic about being outnumbered. I do think there will be some blood.

"You can't have a revolution—even a peaceful one—without some casualties."

THE DEEPENING CRISIS . . . NO. 3

'Negroes . . . Just Are Not Ready Yet'

EDITOR'S NOTE: What is the naked basis of the white man's resistance to integration of the Negro in America? Here is a hard look at the core of the problem, often hidden behind polite reasons and rationalizations. This is a third of a special series of articles comprehensively surveying both sides of the argument in today's racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

MACON COUNTY, Ala., July 30 (AP)—It is not uncommon in the South to hear a white segregationist say that, by and large, he likes the Negro.

He sees no inconsistency between having an affection for Negroes and at the same time defending a system that denies them full equality. "The Negroes as a whole just aren't ready yet," he says. "It's not their fault, but that's the way it is at this point."

A key point in his reasoning is that the great majority of Negroes are like children and that, for the time being, they must be treated as such.

A COMPOSITE of many conversations with the thoughtful type of segregationist goes pretty much like this:

"When I was a kid, my best friend was a colored boy. We played together, fished together, slept side by side on hunting trips. I was in and out of his house every day and he was in mine, eating from the same kitchen table.

"After we grew up, I paid his hospital bills and loaned him money when he needed it. I went to the weddings and funerals in his family and he came to ours. On Saturday night, when he got into trouble with the law, who went to the jail at 2 a.m. and bailed him out? I did."

It was a comfortable, harmonious relationship, he says. And even today, while racial strife rises toward the danger point in many places, you can still see this relationship between individual Negroes and whites in the South.

HERE IS A cotton plantation, deep in Alabama.

It is about 10 miles from the nearest community, the nearest sheriff or policeman. In the county, Negroes outnumber the whites, 5 to 1.

Yet the doors of the planter's home are never locked. And when he has to travel, he tells the Negro foreman, "I'll be away a few days. You look after things around here."

At night, the foreman listens to the dogs. If he hears a peculiar note in their barking, he will go outside to investigate. He is proud of being "in charge."

DRIVING INTO the plantation, you see a softball game in a field near the planter's house. Three of his children, including a girl, are playing with the children of the Negro "hoe hands."

In the sun-drenched afternoon, the oldest boy goes fishing with two Negro boys. He brings the sandwiches.

Meanwhile, the oldest girl goes horseback riding, deep in the woods. She is alone. Her parents say they never worry about her, that she is perfectly safe.

Some miles away, in a corner of the plantation, an aged Negro woman sits, rocking, on the porch. She is the widow of a "hoe hand" who worked here many years. The house is hers as long as she lives. The planter asks if she is all right. "Gettin' along jes' fine," she says.

YOUNG GIRL PLAYS WITH FAMILY COOK
She Tries to Teach Woman to Ride Bicycle

A LITTLE scene takes place in the cotton fields. As the Negroes stop work for their mid-day meal, the planter slips a dollar bill into a woman's hand. He tells a man, "Drive her to the store."

You ask what this is about.

For some reason, she brought no food to the fields that morning. "Maybe she hasn't got any money," the planter says, "or maybe she just plain forgot. But I sure can't see her go without eating."

In the winter, when the fields are bare, he finds other work on the plantation for his "hoe hands." They have to eat in the winter, too.

It all adds up to a unique segment of the racial story.

The integrationist, however, calls this "Uncle Tom-ism." And the militant Negro says it is "paternalism," archaic, degrading the Negro, numbing his effort to develop himself.

Let's look further.

THE PLANTER frequently works in the fields beside the "hoe hands." The relationship appears completely comfortable. Little jokes—in language largely unintelligible to a Yankee—pass between them. They agree that the cotton looks good.

"Way I figure," says the Negro foreman, "the better the boss does, the better we do." There will be a bonus for them at Christmas.

He has been on this plantation 24 years, another man for 17, several others for from 8 to 10 years.

The foreman once went to Florida and worked for a year. He came back. Some of the others went north for jobs. They came back, too. All of them have been to school, three, five, six years.

You see television antennae on the Negro houses. The foreman says he saw pictures of the disturbances at Birmingham and elsewhere, North and South. What did he think?

"WELL," HE SAYS, "they is sorry colored folks and they is sorry white folks everywhere, and I wish they'd both jes' leave us alone."

Whether this is the attitude, generally, of the Negro field workers in Macon County is difficult to say. Even the whites there, who consider themselves on close personal terms with their Negroes, say they don't know what the "hoe hands" are thinking, as the clash and clatter of racial trouble comes nearer.

Not all segregationists, of course, profess to like Negroes.

THERE IS the bigot, ridden with fear and hatred of the Negro, and clutching his prejudices. He is the night-rider, shooting indiscriminately into Negro homes, dumping garbage on the front porch of white integrationists.

To anyone who pleads for reason and good will in the struggle over civil rights, he scrawls a "hate letter." It is misspelled, ungrammatical, frequently obscene, dripping venom.

"That type of white man," says a Southern newspaper woman, "is at the bottom of the scale and he knows it. The only thing that separates him from an equally poor, uneducated Negro is the color of his skin. He has to look down on somebody so he looks down on the Negro."

BUT WHAT about the segregationist who says he has a genuine affection for his Negro friends? How does he square this with the fact of injustice and inequality?

He begins with a basic premise, a conviction that underlies most of his attitudes—that, by and large, the Negro has not yet reached a stage of development where he is "ready" for full equality.

"No race on earth ever made so much progress in 100 years as the Negroes have made," he says. "But they did it with the guidance of the white man and they still need our guidance."

Flowing from that comes his opposition to integrated schools.

"THE NEGRO doesn't have the same capacity for learning," he says. "Moreover, his home invironment is seldom conducive to study. So why should my children be held back to his pace? They're both better off in schools where they can advance at their own pace."

The segregationist also says that Negro children frequently come to school unbathed and wearing dirty clothes. He says they come from homes with a high rate of illegitimacy and adds, "I don't wany my kids sitting next to kids who talk openly about what they have seen at home."

For similar reasons, he doesn't want his wife and daughter to sit next to a Negro in a movie theater or a lunch counter, use the same fitting rooms in a store, or the same rest rooms.

Does he really believe the Negro's ultimate goal is to "marry your daughter?" Yes, he does. He's convinced of it.

As to the Negro's right to vote, one segregationist said, "There's no reason why their best people shouldn't vote, those who are educated, literate, and able to make a judgment on candidates and issues. But there aren't many with these qualifications."

SO IT GOES, consistently, over point after point—the assertion that the Negro's level of development is not yet at a stage where he is "ready" for full equality. "What he is asking," segregationists say, "is the rights without the responsibilities."

I once asked a Southern newspaper editor, a segregationist, to itemize the five or six principal reasons why so many Southerners believe in segregation. On the back of an envelope, he set down the various points. Leading his list was one word:

"Habit."

THE DEEPENING CRISIS—NO. 7

8-4-63 Journal-Const.

Here's How It All Began

EDITOR'S NOTE — The struggle for integration of the races in America started quietly. But a historical perspective reveals its inexorable progress to this critical summer of sporadic violence, frustration and discord — a forward march of events predestined to occur from the moment the first slave ship dropped anchor in the free world.

By JULES LOH
Associated Press Writer

There was nothing very complicated about it at the beginning.

A Dutch ship dropped anchor in the harbor at Jamestown, Va., one sweaty August day and its captain, named Jope, rowed ashore and told tobacco man John Rolfe and some of the others that he had a cargo of "20 negars" which he wished to swap for food.

The Negroes probably had been captured as pirate booty on the high seas from some Spanish vessel for they had names like Isabella, Pedro and Antonio, though the language they spoke surely wasn't Spanish.

Where they came from really didn't matter much to the colonists. After all, many were indentured servants themselves. In fact just a few months earlier a boatload of 90 "young maidens" had arrived from Europe to become wives of the first 90 bachelors who would go the price of 20 pounds of tobacco per maiden.

THE YEAR was 1619. In some respects it is as profound a date in American history as the following year, 1620, when the Mayflower arrived.

However wide the chasm of racial separation was to become during the succeeding 3½ centuries, not a single segment of the fabric of American life would go untouched by the black thread introduced into the nation's social and cultural loom that day at Jamestown.

Harper's Ferry, Little Rock, Bloody Kansas, Birmingham—what generation has not known racial violence? Dred Scott, Medgar Evers, Theodore Bilbo, Marcus Garvey, John Brown—how many names has "the Negro question" thrust into national prominence? Lynch law, Mr. Interlocutor, freedom rides, underground railroad, jazz, Ku Klux Klan, sit-ins, eeny meeny miney moe catch a nigger by the toe — what man, woman or child in all the land can say he has escaped the influence of the Negro in his midst?

THE PEOPLE of Jamestown could have suspected none of this; their part in the emerging drama was innocent enough.

The 20 Negroes melded quite nicely into their established system of servitude whereby a man could be sold, or sell himself, for a certain duration. After working or buying off his bondage he was as free, white or black, as any other man. For four decades Negroes lived in Virginia on a basis of equality, accumulating land, voting in assemblies. One Negro even bought a white servant. There guess, had been forcibly exported and another 30 to 40 million had died before they could be sold.

It wasn't the custom of slavery — an institution as old as Moses — but the commercialization of it that had such melancholy results.

Historically slaves were merely unfortunate folks who happened to have been captured in battle or maybe went bankrupt. It could happen to anybody. Race certainly wasn't a factor and there was no stigma of basic inferiority attached to their lot.

Portugal, for example, had elaborate codes developed over the centuries which made slavery far from a hopeless plight. Families could not be split up; masters were forbidden to injure slaves; slaves could testify in court, even against their owners, and so forth.

IN AMERICA, on the other hand, there were no slave codes. Moreover, only Negroes were slaves. Thus, unlike the attitudes which developed in other countries of the Western hemisphere where the slave ships docked, slavery in the United States gradually came to be regarded as the natural condition of the black man and his color therefore a mark of intrinsic inferiority.

As it became necessary from time to time for American law to define a slave he was described variously as "a chattel" or "real estate" or finally, in the opinion of Chief Justice Roger B. Taney in the 1856 Dred Scott decision, merely an "article of merchandise."

Legally, slaves were incapable of matrimony, which meant they could have children but not families. In 1838 slave dealer Benjamin Davis of Hamburg, S.C., advertised that his current stock "consists of . . . several small boys without their mothers."

trained tutor named Eli Whitney spent a few idle days in 1792 at the home of the Widow Green in Savannah and noticed how frustratingly tedious was the job of extracting seeds from the tenacious fibers in a boll of short staple upland cotton.

His invention of the cotton gin moved slavery from convenient luxury to economic necessity as small farms became huge plantations. By 1850 three-fourths of the world's cotton was being supplied by the Gulf states and planters felt the economy of the entire Southland depended on slave labor. To a great many in the cotton kingdom it appeared obvious that slavery was a positive good, and practicing it was simply following the natural order of things.

"OUR NEW government," explained Alexander Stephens of Georgia the day he was named vice president of the Confederacy, "is based upon this great physical, philosophical and moral truth . . . that the Negro is not equal to the white man, that slavery — subordination to the superior race—is his natural and normal condition."

Stephens acknowledged that "this truth has been slow in the process of its development," but once the process was complete there could no longer be any such thing as a literally free Negro.

An owner could, of course, free a slave, though in some cases it required consent of the legislature or a $1,000 bond to insure his good behavior. But he still remained the prisoner of his skin.

Most of the slave laws continued to apply to him. In some states he couldn't possess firearms, poison, dogs or whisky. Others had deadlines for him to get out of the state or be sold back into slavery—Virginia one year; North Carolina 90 days; Tennessee immediately.

a bad deal and sold her to someone else for a $50 profit.

As the Negro's legal status sank lower and lower so did his human status. He became the butt of ridicule, the subject of caricature by comics who discovered burnt cork. Most famous of all the antebellum blackface minstrels was Daddy Dan Rice who toured the country for years performing a thigh-slapping song and dance number titled "Jump, Jim Crow!"

THE NEGROES had songs of their own, generally regarded as quaint. They had words like "Go Down, Moses, 'Way Down in Egypt Land, and Tell Old Pharaoh to Let My People Go," and "Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen" and "Oh, Mary, Don't You Weep, Don't You Moan. . . ."

From Socrates to Lincoln, wherever slavery has existed there have been voices to oppose it.

SLAVEOWNER Thomas Jefferson, in his first draft of the Declaration of Independence, wrote a blistering indictment of George III for his part in the slave trade but the 167 words were stricken out.

Concerning slavery Jefferson later wrote "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, that His justice cannot sleep forever," and predicted that slavery would be the "rock upon which the old Union would split." Patrick Henry, another slaveowner, said, "I will not, I cannot, justify it." Neither man anticipated the cotton gin and both thought slavery would gradually fade away.

Benjamin Franklin wasn't that patient. He joined the Abolitionist Society and became its president. George Washington set his slaves free on his deathbed; John Adams refused to own them at all.

Through the years another nence, persuaded Congress to buy some territory in Africa which later became the independent state of Liberia. Only about 6,000 American Negroes chose to move there, however. The latest and perhaps the most colorful back-to-Africa advocate was Marcus Manassen Garvey, a Jamaican Negro educated in London who came to New York in 1917 wearing a purple and gold uniform and three-cornered hat. He wound up in the Atlanta penitentiary for using the mail to defraud.

From the beginning most Negro leaders have denounced emigration ideas. During the Liberian movement a speaker at a Negro rally in Hartford cried, "Why should we leave this land so dearly bought by the blood, groans and tears of our fathers?"

THE AUDIENCE nodded, perhaps recalling that during the Revolutionary War (when all the colonies practiced slavery except Pennsylvania where the Quakers held it to be an evil deserving of excommunication) there were enough Negoes in the Continental Army's ranks that the British had a barracks doggerel which went:

The Rebel clowns, oh
what a sight,
So awkward is their figure.
Yonder stands a pious
wight,

American abolitionists scored their first major victory in 1808 when Congress declared the slave trade illegal. The act did not stop the trade — an estimated 250,000 more Negroes were smuggled in — but it did increase the hazard and slaves became far more valuable. George Washington paid $500 for a slave, but in 1853 a No. 1 male fetched $1,250 on the New Orleans market and by 1860 the price was $1,800. When civil war came fewer than 5 per

After working or buying off his bondage he was as free, white or black, as any other man. For four decades Negroes lived in Virginia on a basis of equality, accumulating land, voting in assemblies. One Negro even bought a white servant. There was no inferiority attached to skin color. That came later.

The significance of their arrival in 1619 was that it marked the first contact between the American colonies and the Atlantic slave trade.

It was perhaps inevitable that America should be caught up in the trade. For nearly four centuries beginning about 1500, slave ships flying Portuguese, Dutch, English and, finally, American flags competed for favor on the African coast

THEY STACKED their human cargo like cordwood in the fetid holds and in the two-foot space 'tween decks and headed for the thriving markets in the new world. Each day during the 10-week voyage they could count on having to toss a few dead ones over the side. Mutinies were frequent; suicides commonplace.

Most of the slaves imported in America came from the Guinea coast, the Gold Coast, Gambia and Senegal; some kidnapped by whites, most captured by corrupt African chieftains and traded for rum and guns. In 1736 Col. William Byrd of Virginia said in a letter to the Earl of Egmont, "They import so many Negroes hither that I fear this colony will some time or other be confirmed by the name of New Guinea." By the time Col. Byrd's children were grown the Virginia population was estimated at 300,000 whites and 200,000 slaves.

WHEN THE TRADE finally petered out more than 15 million Africans, a conservative

THE LAW FORBADE a slave to learn to read or write, to leave the premises without a pass or to assemble with fellow slaves without a white person present to overhear any insurrection plots. He — or she — couldn't testify in any litigation involving a white person.

It took decades, however, for the idea of black inferiority finally to mature. Perhaps it never would have had not a Yale

SOME NEGROES, for lack of security, returned to slavery voluntarily. A rare few managed their freedom quite well. In Louisiana a free Negro named Cyprian Ricard owned nearly 100 slaves, and North Carolina freedman Thomas Day hired white help in his cabinet shop. A free Negro shoemaker in South Carolina earned enough to buy his wife from her owner for $700. Later he decided it was

SLAVEOWNER Thomas Jefferson, in his first draft of the Declaration of Independence, wrote a blistering indictment of George III for his part in the slave trade but the 167 words were stricken out.

Concerning slavery Jefferson later wrote "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, that His justice cannot sleep forever," and predicted that slavery would be the "rock upon which the old Union would split." Patrick Henry, another slaveowner, said, "I will not, I cannot, justify it." Neither man anticipated the cotton gin and both thought slavery would gradually fade away.

Benjamin Franklin wasn't that patient. He joined the Abolitionist Society and became its president. George Washington set his slaves free on his deathbed; John Adams refused to own them at all.

Through the years another scheme has attracted intermittent interest as a solution to the Negro's plight: emigration to Africa.

AS EARLY AS 1812 a Negro sea captain, Paul Cuffee, tried unsuccessfully to establish an African colony for American Negroes. In 1820 the American Colonization Society, backed by John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay and others of similar promi-the Quakers held it to be an evil deserving of excommunication) there were enough Negoes in the Continental Army's ranks that the British had a barracks doggerel which went:

The Rebel clowns, oh
what a sight,
So awkward is their figure.
Yonder stands a pious
wight,

American abolitionists scored their first major victory in 1808 when Congress declared the slave trade illegal. The act did not stop the trade — an estimated 250,000 more Negroes were smuggled in — but it did increase the hazard and slaves became far more valuable. George Washington paid $500 for a slave, but in 1853 a No. 1 male fetched $1,250 on the New Orleans market and by 1860 the price was $1,800. When civil war came fewer than 5 per cent of the South's 8 million people were slaveowners.

After the Missouri Compromise struck a tenuous sectional balance in 1820 between 12 slave and 12 free states, the abolitionist movement began to develop with the fervor of politics and the zeal of religion. In 20 years' time the American Anti-Slavery Society counted 250,000 members in 15 states and published 25 journals, and it was but one group among several.

IN MANY RESPECTS the various organizations were prototypes of the civil rights groups in today's headlines; change the dates on some of the handbills and history would seem to be repeating itself.

William Lloyd Garrison, one of the most militant of the abolitionists, advocated moral persuasion and passive resistance. "Perhaps blood will flow," he once told a friend, "but not through any counsel of mine." John Brown took an opposite stance, holding that "slavery is a state of war." In a third camp were Arthur Tappan, James Birney, Gerrit Smith and others who believed in political action and in 1840 helped organize the Liberal Party.

Abolitionist literature flooded the mails.

IN THE SOUTH it was contraband and in 1835 a mob sacked the Charleston post office and burned all the propaganda they could find. In Alabama a grand jury indicted Ransom Williams of New York in absentia for mailing his newspaper into the state. In Kentucky Cassius M. Clay kept a loaded cannon at the door of his Lexington office where he published The True American. In Alton, Ill., Editor Elijah P. Lovejoy, three of his presses already thrown in the river, tried to defend the fourth and was shot to death by a mob. In Brunswick, Maine, a mother of six, Harriet Beecher Stowe, took time off from her housework to write a book, more a tract than a novel, which sold 300,000 copies within a year and immortalized such names as Uncle Tom, Simon Legree and Topsy.

Emotions were high, tempers hot. On Capitol Hill Congressman Brooks of South Carolina lit into Senator Sumner of Massachusetts with his cane. There was no middle ground. When war came few were surprised.

If Appomattox solved some problems, it left many more in its bloody wake.

THE SOUTH was in ruins and disorganized former slaves wandered idly about the wreckage. Only one in 10 could read or write. For many, attainment of their ideal was the beginning of their disillusionment. Now able to own property, few were equipped to manage it. But with federal bayonets to protect them at the polls and carpetbaggers to show them how to vote, they became a powerful political force.

Soon the state legislatures of South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi had majorities of Negro members, most of whom learned the rudiments of reading and writing after they were elected. Many of them engaged in what one conservative historian refers to "a saturnalis of corrupt expenditure" and the demoralized South added further economic woes to its misery. There were any number of occasions for the hatred engendered by war to flame again.

Negro rule in the South was such an obvious failure that few Northern states were willing to apply the same reconstruction plans to their own areas. Connecticut, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Ohio and Michigan, for example, refused the Negro the right to vote.

WHEN PRESIDENT Hayes withdrew federal troops from the South in 1877 white reaction was swift, and in the light of what had happened, predictable.

Legal barriers began to be erected against the Negro, such as the "Grandfather Clause" invented by Louisiana in 1898 which denied a ballot to anyone whose grandfather hadn't voted prior to 1867. Private organizations were formed to restore "the Southern way of life" — the KKK, the White Brotherhood, Pale Faces, Knights of the White Camellia.

Lines of segregation were drawn, and they were unmistakable. When Homer Plessy, a Negro, was removed from a white railroad coach in 1896 and took the case to the U.S. Supreme Court the idea of "separate but equal" became the law of the land.

Over the years the Negro began to protest.

As the protests grew louder, the Jim Crow signs began to fall. More important to the Negro, so did the Jim Crow laws. In the history of the colored man in America, the year 1954, when "separate but equal" was stricken from the law, was as significant as the year "involuntary servitude" was outlawed. Recent events surely prove this.

No one can know when the next turning point will be, what shape it will take. But a glance at how we got where we are, a look ahead at the ever-deepening crisis as America's ears are being assailed as never before, and the suspicion is that it couldn't be far off.

Action Muffles Negro Voices

Editor's Note: A new Negro militancy is apparent in this turbulent summer as voices of responsible moderates are drowned out by radicals who preach an inflammatory approach to racial equality. Here is a closeup of the militant Negro movement.

By JUNIUS GRIFFIN

NEW YORK, Aug. 5 (AP)—Voices of moderation in both Northern and Southern Negro communities are muffled today.

In vogue is a Negro militancy, conceived in frustration and impatience.

Radical organizations preaching inflammatory tactics have emerged in the ghettos where most Northern Negroes live.

In the South, the militant leadership seeks to organize largely undisciplined would-be followers into concerted action.

If the moderate Negro in the South or North speaks out against demonstrations that might result in violence, he often is branded an "Uncle Tom" and a coward. For a Negro to express a moderate view on any civil rights issue is to risk his reputation and maybe his personal safety.

AN EXAMPLE of the radical's vehemence was evident when James H. Meredith and Rev. J. H. Jackson, president of the Baptist Convention, ventured to counsel a conservative course at the annual convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Chicago.

Meredith, who risked his life and the safety of his family to establish the right of a Negro to attend the University of Mississippi, was attacked by a youthful wing of the NAACP with such a bitterness that he publicly admitted, "I wept my first tears since I was a child."

Jackson, who heads the largest Negro religious organization in the nation, was booed and narrowly escaped injury before being escorted from the Chicago convention.

Sam Riley, Chicago chairman of the Congress of Racial Equality, resigned his post, saying "I'm sick of sit-ins and picket lines."

Riley's resignation came in protest against what he termed the "ultramilitant tactics of the kids" in the organization. "I prefer to plan and negotiate," Riley said.

IT WAS MILITANT civil rights demonstrations in Cambridge, Md., during June and July that split the Eastern Shore town and then brought it back together when violent racial conflict threatened.

The Cambridge demonstrations caused President Kennedy to comment:

"I am concerned about these demonstrations. I think they go beyond information, beyond protest, and they get into a very bad situation where you get violence, and I think the cause of advancing equal opportunities only loses. So I have warned against demonstrations which could lead to bloodshed and I warn now against them."

The President added, however, "You just can't tell people, 'don't protest' — but on the other hand, 'We're not going to let you come into a store or restaurant.' "

"The way to make the problem go away," the President said, ". . . is to provide for redress of grievances."

demonstrations and advocating that "Negro leaders negotiate their grievances with the city fathers."

The influence of the radicals is apparent in the concentrated attack on the "the Big Four" action groups for equal rights. This attack is led by radical organizations such as the Black Muslims and a variety of African Nationalist associations.

These organizations have attracted larger gatherings on Harlem street corners on occasion than the combined forces of the NAACP, the Congress of Racial Equality, The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

The success of radical elements in Negro communities is due partly to their ability to identify with grass-roots elements.

DR. MARTIN Luther King Jr., at a recent public appearance in Harlem, was greeted with a barrage of eggs from unidentified Negroes before he entered a church. The leader of a nationalist group blamed the incident on "Communists."

King and leaders of the other "Big Four" groups constantly are referred to as "Uncle Toms" by the radical leadership in Harlem.

One radical explains the popularity of the extremist movement this way:

"We give the forgotten man a dignity that the NAACP, CORE and the other groups deny him. We let him know that he is just as important as the middleclass Negro who wants to ignore his presence in the community.

"The curse of many years of segregation has left him an almost hopeless cripple, a cripple that cannot be cured or rehabilitated even if we were to acquire his complete civil rights overnight. Most of these people will be looking for a handout for the rest of their lives."

THE RADICAL leader adds:

"The individual Negro who fits this description is bitter and ready to fight somebody. If he wants to fight, he might as well join an organization that will guide him in the right direction."

For the African Nationalist, the "right direction" is back to Africa.

Most Negro leaders do not share the idea that Negroes will support organizations that preach a "back to Africa" movement.

But some NAACP officials acknowledged that the nationalists are a thorn in the side for conservative leaders.

NAACP membership is around 4,000 in Harlem, a community of more than a half million Negroes. Most of the members merely pay dues and carry membership cards, but do not attend meetings.

Dissatisfaction with the "Big Four" civil rights organizations is obvious in Harlem.

Who leads the community and pulls the strings?

Who could channel the "new Negro militancy" into a concerted action?

CONGRESSMAN Adam Clayton Powell, D-N.Y., is the spiritual and political king of a large element of the "black burgeois."

noise and get the publicity while the NAACP furnishes the manpower and pays the bills. A good many things have not been made known to our membership. They have come to believe that we are standing on the sidelines working up legal cases while everybody else is participating in nonviolent direct action. We don't like to have people talking about us as if we were old and sitting in the corner knitting."

WHITNEY YOUNG JR., Urban League director, said: "I do not see why I should have to go to jail to prove my leadership."

His organization, though conservative in its approach, seeks civil rights progress through biracial consultation and cooperation.

James Farmer, CORE's national director, said his organization is the "nonviolent Marines of the civil rights struggle."

"It's going to be a long hot summer," Farmer said. "Spontaneous demonstrations are going to be a problem. Our job is to channelize them constructively."

To a great extent, the frictions among these major groups offer no real threat to Negro solidarity on fundamental aims.

Young said: "We are sympathetic to the methods of the other . . . organizations. There are temporary misunderstandings and overlapping, but that's to be expected."

A militancy similar to that in Cambridge moved north to Brooklyn where Negro ministers gathered their congregations from the ghettos of Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant section, described as a "wasteland in the heart of New York."

The militant Negro ministers vowed to lead their entire congregations to jail, if necessary, in pressing their demand for more jobs for Negroes and Puerto Ricans on publicly financed construction projects.

IN SAVANNAH, where National Guardsmen were summoned to quell racial demonstrations, Dr. William Payne, president of Savannah State College for Negroes, refused to make public statements on the situation. The city's Negro community branded him an "Uncle Tom." (Dr. Payne died July 26 after suffering a cerebral hemorrhage.)

In Charlotte, where the city government has made strides on the civil rights front, a leading Negro physician, Dr. Emery L. Rann, became an "Uncle Tom" for suggesting the end of racial segregation has left him an almost hopeless cripple, a cripple that cannot be cured or rehabilitated even if we were to acquire his complete civil rights overnight. Powell exercises control from the pulpit of Abyssinian Baptist Church, the Harlem Democratic Club and a variety of civic organizations of which he is sponsor.

The Harlem Democrat attacks the presence of white men in positions of authority in the "Big Four" civil rights organizations and recently has been vocal in his support of Malcolm X, Harlem's Black Muslim leader.

Malcolm X attracts thousands with tirades against the white man. But Negroes more often than not leave his rallies without having found solutions to their problems.

A young Negro leaving a Muslim rally commented:

"I dig this cat. But I am not about to become a Black Muslim. I've never been to Africa and don't want to go. I don't care for his religion. What I need is a job so I can make some bread (money)."

His problem is shared by many. About 13 per cent of Harlem's labor force is unemployed. This represents more than twice the percentage for the City of New York at large.

Asked if he had sought employment through the Urban League and other organizations, the young man replied:

"I don't even know where their offices are."

AT LEAST 50 others on Harlem street corners, in pool rooms, taverns and restaurants did not know where the NAACP, CORE or Urban League offices are. Many volunteered, "I don't know and I don't care."

Told of this condition, Paul Zuber, a Harlem lawyer who recently retired from active civil rights work, said, "The only solution to this crucial problem is for all four civil rights organizations to unite and present a solid front."

He readily admitted this is an unpopular view, but said, "The real problem is the refusal of these organizations to actively recruit in the Negro community. The partially suppressed feuds between the organizations tend to make them unpopular and conceal their commendable work for civil rights."

Roy Wilkins, NAACP executive secretary, said recently, "The other organizations furnish the

Youth Confesses 33 Arson Cases

CHICAGO, Aug. 6 (AP) — Police said Monday that a 16-year-old has admitted setting 33 fires in the Chicago area, including one which was responsible for the deaths of two men.

Police said the boy, Alan Norcutt, who lives with his stepparents, has been charged with 13 counts of arson.

The youth was apprehended Sunday night while allegedly in the process of setting a blaze in the basement of an abandoned building on the near North Side, police said. Three other youths arrested with Norcutt were released into custody of their parents.

Foreign Envoys Get Bitter Taste

By MAX HARRELSON
Associated Press Writer

Few events in the United States have commanded such wide attention abroad as the developing crisis over integration.

The impact of the violent and dramatic conflicts at Little Rock, Oxford, Birmingham, Cambridge, Savannah, Philadelphia and New York City, has been tremendous.

U.S. policy makers acknowledge they are concerned over possible repercussions in the nonwhite nations of Asia and Africa.

How much damage, they ask, have recent events done to the U.S. image as a champion of human rights? Have these events had any discernible effect on the relations between the United States and other countries?

U.S. officials disagree on the extent of the damage, but influential leaders such as Secretary of State Dean Rusk and U.N. Ambassador Adlai E. Stevenson believe the United States definitely is being hurt abroad by the racial conflict.

THE SITUATION is complicated by several factors likely to make some countries more sensitive to U.S. events:

—The independence explosion which has brought to the world scene in the past decade a large contingent of new nations whose people had been under the white man's rule for generations. In many cases there were strong racial resentments.

The personal experience of many Asian and African visitors, especially diplomats, who came face to face with racial discrimination in the United States and were left with a bitter taste. Rusk reported scores of such incidents in the past two years.

—The preoccupation of the African and Asian countries with the apartheid (racial segregation) policies of South Africa. This not only makes them more conscious of the developments in the United States, but renders it difficult for the United States to form its own independent policies on South Africa and related world problems.

—Communist efforts to exploit the U.S. racial problem with the aim of discrediting the United States in the eyes of Asians and Africans.

RUSK told a congressional committee recently that the Communists regard racial discrimination "as one of their most valuable assets." He warned that unless Congress acts to remove discriminatory practices "hostile propaganda might be expected to hurt us more than it has hurt us until now."

Stevenson says he finds U.N. diplomats generally tolerant and understanding, but even they have been "shocked by what they have seen and heard in recent months."

Even more serious, he believes, is the "false impression" created abroad about the attitude of the bulk of the American people and the official policy of the government. This must be corrected as promptly as possible, he says.

Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, American Negro who is an undersecretary of the United Nations, says "repression" of the Negro has hurt the United States "because the basic image of the United States is that of a democratic nation leading the cause of world freedom."

exploiting U.S. racial tensions: (1) Racism is inevitable under American capitalism; (2) inaction by the government is tantamount to the support of the "racists"; (3) racial incidents have exposed the "hypocrisy" of U.S. claims to world leadership, and (4) the attitude toward Negroes in the United States is indicative of the attitude toward colored peoples everywhere.

In the United Nations a few weeks ago, Soviet delegate Platon D. Morozov told a committee the "unbridled racism" in the United States has proved there is "no moral basis" to claims that the United States is the defender of human rights in the world. This theme has been stressed in the Soviet press.

There is no evidence so far that the Soviet campaign has driven a wedge between the United States and other friendly countries or that any are ready to follow Soviet suggestions that the United Nations should get out of the United States because of racial discrimination.

THIS IDEA was brought up by the Russians two years ago after African delegations received a scurrilous, unsigned letter threatening their safety. Some Africans were angered by the letter, but Stevenson soothed them by denouncing the senders and stating that the FBI was making a thorough inquiry.

Discrimination in housing and restaurants, however, continues to cause ill-feeling both in Washington and New York where large numbers of nonwhite diplomats are concentrated. One African diplomat, Ambassador Gershon B. O. Collier of Sierra Leone, put it this way:

"Your American Negroes understand this kind of prejudice and are used to it. We are not."

DURING THE SUMMIT meeting of African leaders in Addis Ababa, the U.S. racial crisis was widely discussed. Milton Obote, prime minister of Uganda, said: "The key to the successful projection of the United States image in Africa lies more in a solution of the Negro problem than in foreign aid."

The Ethiopian Herald was more critical. It referred to the U.S. government's "half-hearted willingness" to act against discrimination and said:

"The United States is campaigning on a free world slogan and is condemning the racist government of South Africa while practicing its own version of apartheid. What happened in Birmingham . . . showed the United States in its true light."

No African leader has sought publicly to put the United States in the category with South Africa, which has been haled before the United Nations repeatedly because of its official policy of racial segregation.

The London Daily Telegraph pointed out the distinction. In the United States, it said, "the law is on the black man's side," while "the inferiority of the black man was written into the Constitution of the South African Union."

RUSK says the Communists have used four main themes in

THE DEEPENING CRISIS . . . NO. 11

Where Did Racial Hate Begin?

8-8-64

By JUNIUS GRIFFIN
Associated Press Writer

"We are not something from Porgy and Bess . . . we want to share equally with our white brothers—yes, brothers."

These are the words of Herbert Fielding, businessman and a leader of the Negro community of Charleston, S.C.

An official in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Fielding prides himself on being a moderate. But he sums up the temptation to violence, to express old angers that many American Negroes feel in this summer of crisis.

"The Negro is mad," he says, "not angry, but mad and filled with a hate he has nourished for almost a lifetime."

THE FEELING is echoed in the North as a Negro youth suddenly snatches a white woman's handbag and flings it into the street.

"I did it because I hate white people," he explains.

You hear the word "hate" again and again as Negroes, packed into the ghettos of Harlem and Washington try to articulate their feelings. In Savannah and Charleston you hear it once more.

In Columbia, S.C., a Negro talks of his "intense dislike" of the white man.

In Charlotte, N.C., a Negro says simply: "We dislike the white man, but he's doing better."

North and South, animosity is a palpable thing. In the South because the Negro feels the weight of "Jim Crow" laws, written and unwritten; in the North because he faces discrimination when he wants to get a job or live in certain neighborhoods.

WHERE DID IT all begin . . . and where will it end?

Hosea Williams, 37, militant head of the Chatham County Crusade for Voters in Savannah, said:

"We Negroes weren't born hating the white man. We have cultivated this hatred and nourished it for years hoping that one day he would make us ashamed of ourselves. But he hasn't . . . he has given us pride . . . pride to protest and if necessary to tell him to go to hell if he doesn't allow us full and equal opportunities."

Williams said that he once worked for the NAACP. .

"But, I became too hot for them, or rather too radical. I don't believe in tomorrow. I want equal rights for my people now. If necessary, I intend to die in Georgia fighting for what I believe is right and to leave my children an honorable legacy," he said.

In Charleston, NAACP official Fielding delights in talking about the historical beauty of the city and its traditions.

"The white man's great failing here is that he doesn't know that his Negro neighbors are just as prideful, stubborn, and sensitive about this great city as they are."

same clubs, live in the same neighborhoods, or even speak to each other.

E. Cedric Hart, publisher and editor of South Carolina's only Negro newspaper, said this intra-racial color problem hinders the solving of the larger racial conflict.

"My attitudes are those of a militant person," Hart said, "but I refuse to use my newspaper as a militant mouthpiece for the NAACP and disgruntled persons in the Negro community until they unite for a common good and stop bickering among themselves."

Charlotte, N.C., has eased racial barriers in hotels, restaurants, schools and recreational facilities, but still is plagued with racial problems in hospitals and in job opportunities.

Dr. Reginald A. Hawkins, a Charlotte dentist and ordained Presbyterian minister, says:

"I served in World War II and the Korean war, and I have no intention of stopping my people's fight for equal rights. We want those rights now, not gradually . . . but now."

Dr. Emory L. Rann, a Charlotte physician and leading Negro moderate, has spoken against racial demonstrations.

"Our demonstrations have simply outgrown their usefulness," Dr. Rann said. "It is now time we started negotiating with the City Council. I don't see what good we can now derive from an ugly incident which could occur during a demonstration."

Dr. Rann stands almost alone in Charlotte's Negro community.

In addition to the division between militant and moderates in the Negro movement for racial integration there also is a split between what Negroes call "ceremonial leaders" and others who are close to the pulse of America's Negro masses.

CEREMONIAL LEADERS are described by the Negroes as those who stay away from the underprivileged within their own race and who have lost contact with the Negro people as a whole.

S. Summer Stone Jr., editor of Washington's Afro American, declares:

"We need leaders who will continue to meet this problem head on—courageous and valiant fighters for racial equality in America."

"The white man's great failing here is that he doesn't know that his Negro neighbors are just as prideful, stubborn, and sensitive about this great city as they are."

SPEAKING OF the deeping racial crisis, Fielding said:

"We are at the bottom, the end of the rope. The only way the Negro can go is up. And if we must fight to get there, both races will wear the battle scars for generations to come.

"From where I view the racial situation, I see us emerging with a victory. And I see the white man going down in defeat. With just a little sincere effort on the white man's part we can both leave the battle scene in victory, knowing that we have solved a century-old problem through mutual effort."

Rev. I. DeQuincey Newman, NAACP state field secretary, foresees a long and bitter fight ahead for Negroes in Charleston and other parts of South Carolina.

"If the white man had any sincere desire about ending this problem, he would take down the barriers of segregation and allow responsible Negro leaders to concentrate on preparing the poor and impoverished Negro for the role he is to play in our new society," Newman said.

"We no longer ask the Negro masses not to hate," Newman added, "we tell him that, if he must hate, he should try to show a little mercy. This is a harsh but realistic view."

IN COLUMBIA, Dr. Howard E. Wright, president of Allen University, an all-Negro school, said "the task of helping our students to face the realities of our times is just as important as sending them out into the world with an academic education.

"The racial tempo here is such that any incident in a downtown restaurant or store can cause our students to drop their books and take to the streets.

"It's too bad that I can't join them. I can't tell them that everything will work itself out. This would be a lie."

Negroes in Columbia and Charleston live in a caste system within their own race.

Negroes who have light complexions are disdainful of their darker brothers, so much so that often they do not worship in the same churches, frequent the

Should There Be 'Compensation' for Negroes?

Should the American Negro, for a limited period, receive more than equal treatment in jobs, housing and the like to make up for his long years of deprivation? This question is at the heart of the so-called doctrine of compensation, which has emerged from the civil-rights campaign; the articles below present two responses to it. Whitney M. Young Jr. is executive director of the National Urban League. Kyle Haselden is managing editor of The Christian Century and author of "The Racial Problem in Christian Perspective."

'DOMESTIC MARSHALL PLAN'

By WHITNEY M. YOUNG Jr.

IN 1948, by instituting the Marshall Plan to aid the war-torn countries of Europe, the United States took a step unparalleled in history. Recognizing the special need of the nations shattered by World War II, the people of this country committed some $17 billion in money, machines and technical aid to help our neighbors overseas to take their place again in the community of free nations.

This rightful action was in keeping with the long tradition of America's moral, political and economic credo. We have long given special, emergency aid to the oppressed, the sick, the handicapped and deprived. In recent years, we have seen this concept put into action through our aid—in employment, education and welfare—to Hungarian and Cuban refugees. We see it annually carried out in the form of emergency help to "depressed" and "disaster" areas, suffering from joblessness or devastation by hurricanes, drought and other misfortunes. The "G. I. Bill of Rights" after World War II was, in a sense, a recognition of the special need of our discharged veterans for education, housing, employment and other benefits.

Recently, the National Urban League has attracted nationwide attention with its proposal for a temporary "more-than-equal" program of aid for Negro citizens. In the current drive for civil rights, with its demonstrations, marches and sit-ins, this proposal has confused many white Americans. They ask: Is the Negro not to be satisfied by equality alone? Or, is he seeking, not equality, but preference? In the face of these questions, our history should teach us that what the Urban League proposes is not only directly in the American tradition, but has the arguments of racial justice, economic practicality and morality—secular as well as religious—behind it.

ON an economic level, the hard but simple fact—borne out by comparative statistics on unemployment, income, mortality rates, substandard housing and education—is that the past of the Negro exists in the present. Citizens everywhere must realize that the effects of over 300 years of oppression cannot be obliterated by doing business as usual. They must know, too, that in today's complex, technological society, a strong back and a will to succeed are no longer sufficient to break the bonds of deprivation, as was the case with minority groups in the past. For, in addition to the ordinary forces affecting one's way of life, the Negro's struggle into America's mainstream has been thwarted by the barriers of dis- (Continued on Page 129)

'PARITY, NOT PREFERENCE'

By KYLE HASELDEN

AN increasing number of Negro and white Americans agree that securing complete freedom and total equality for the Negro is this nation's No. 1 domestic issue and that justice for the deprived one-tenth of the nation's population is the end toward which the whole society should move speedily. Unanimous in this agreement, they nevertheless disagree as to the permissible and effective means to that end.

Varied in their temperaments, their religious convictions, their sense of what is prudent and practical, these Americans prefer one or another of the various strategies which seek racial justice. The options range from the doctrine of violent rebellion against white domination at one extreme to a patient yet active appeal to the nation's creeds, congresses and courts at the other. Between these extremes fall various nonviolent strategies and schemes, each with its own supporters.

Unfortunately there are, in the ranks of men and women genuinely committed to racial justice, some who insist that unanimity of purpose requires uniformity of plan. They insist that whites and Negroes who share their objective also adopt their methods—however unruly, eccentric and impractical those methods—or accept vilification for Uncle Tomism. This absolutist, autocratic spirit believes that justice for the Negro is the ultimate criterion of all human action and that this end validates any means, whatever practicality or religious principle may dictate to the contrary.

This is a dangerous mood. It divides those who seek justice for Negroes; it alienates influential moderates unnecessarily; and, most serious, this authoritarian spirit lures the Negro into activities which corrupt his purpose and defeat his ultimate hope.

IN the struggle for racial justice a technique is not valid simply because it annoys the white man or because it promises some temporary advantage to the Negro. It is valid only if it honors the moral ground on which the Negro makes his claim for justice, respects the right of all men to the same justice, preserves in the human relationship values which are equivalents of justice, and promotes rather than prevents the Negro's progress.

The idea of compensation, which has been suggested as a device to equalize competition between whites and Negroes, fails these crucial tests. By compensation—in the passive rather than the active sense—is meant compensation for the Negro rather than by the Negro. It has been proposed that the Negro cannot succeed in his search for freedom and equality unless there is an arbi- (Continued on Page 128) trary—in fact, artificial—removal of the academic, cultural and professional lag forced upon him by over two centuries of slavery and by another of exploitation. It is argued further that the Negroes years of involuntary, payless servitude established a collectible claim against the descendants of those who enslaved and exploited him.

How can this debt be paid? The proposal is that the Negro be given preference in employment wherever a vacancy occurs, a premium in salary, and a quota system guaranteeing that one-tenth of all people hired by firms, professional enterprises and industries be Negroes. Even though this proposal is obviously unfeasible, what shall we say of it as a theory?

COMPENSATION must be rejected as an equalizer of competition between Negroes and whites for several reasons, all of which rest on the grounds to which the Negro appeals in his demand for freedom and equality.

First, compensation for Negroes is a subtle but pernicious form of racism. It requires that men be dealt with by society on the basis of race and color rather than on the basis of their humanity. It would therefore as a public policy legalize, deepen and perpetuate the abominable racial cleavage which has ostracized and crippled the American Negro. Racism, whoever may be its temporary beneficiary, should be eliminated from the social order, not confirmed by it.

Second, preferential economic status for Negroes would penalize the living in a futile attempt to collect a debt owed by the dead. The 20th-century white man is no more to blame for the fact that his ancestors bought and held slaves than are 20th-century Negroes for the fact that some of their ancestors captured and sold slaves. This is the ironic tragedy of exploitation. It leaves with the descendants of the exploiters a guilt they cannot cancel and with the descendants of the exploited a debt they cannot collect.

Third, a scheme which gives Negroes preference in employment and a premium in salary would bestow on Negroes the debilitating social status which has for centuries cursed the initiative and enterprise of the white man in the South. Preferred status for the Negro, however much society may owe him a debt, will inevitably destroy in him the initiative and enterprise required of a minority people in a highly competitive society. Slavery corrupts ambition and self-reliance; so, too, does patronizing social status.

Fourth, compensation for Negroes would be unfair to other minorities handicapped by their history or by rapid social and industrial change: Puerto Ricans, Mexican-Americans, migrants of all races, Indians, coal miners and others. Negroes are entirely right in demanding that they be hired, paid and promoted on their merit and in boycotting those enterprises which discriminate on a racial basis. But they are not right in demanding an artificial scheme which is unworkable, racist, destructive of initiative and unfair to other struggling Americans.

Our goal should be parity, not preferment, and there are three things we must do, none of them pleasant, none easy, if we are to attain it.

First, there must be a total, across-the-board desegregation of American society. Wherever the white man will not voluntarily surrender the psychic and material advantages of racial discrimination, the Negro must use the law, his power as a consumer, his increasing political leverage, and coercive nonviolent protests to assail and destroy the color structures of our society.

Equality of opportunity is an elemental civil right specifically declared in the sacred documents of the United States. Withholding that right from any people because of their race profanes every tenet in the political and religious creeds of the American people. Denying that right encumbers and humiliates 20,000,000 American citizens. The first business of the nation is the total elimination of racial discrimination and its component, racial segregation.

Such liberation, however, would leave the Negro still handicapped by centuries of poor schooling and by his long exclusion from most trades and professions. A desegregated society would open to the Negro opportunities which are rightfully his and should be granted to him but for which centuries of neglect and abuse leave many of his race inadequately prepared. Even though all racial bars were removed, most Negroes could not, in a free and impartial society, compete on equal terms with most white people for jobs and preferments.

But this, as we have noted, is a handicap which Negroes share with another one-tenth of the population, whose competitive strength has also been sapped by an unfortunate history or by the entrapping eddies of industrial development.

OUR second task, therefore, is to undertake a nationwide crash program for the education, training and employment of the underprivileged, underdeveloped one-fifth of the nation, a domestic Point Four which would give to the employable a fair chance and to the unemployable qualifying education and training. Such a program would be based not on race but on need. Negroes would of course be the chief beneficiaries of an educational and economic crash program, because of the predominant number of deprived Negroes. But a domestic Point Four program aimed at the needs of all the nation's backward peoples would close rather than widen the nation's racial cleavage.

Finally, irritating as it may be, the fact might as well be faced that no immigrant or minority group has ever made its way into the mainstream of American life without studying and working harder and longer than the general population. This is the third task as it now confronts the Negro.

DURING their long pilgrimage through slavery and semi-slavery, most Negroes did not have an incentive for the kind of active self-compensation by which other minorities have climbed out of humiliating servitude into respected equality with other ethnic groups. Slavery and peonage do not generally encourage ambition. Even now the Negro must divert himself—his native abilities and his acquired skills, his initiative and enterprise, his devotion and endurance, his ablest leadership—from the pursuits followed by free men to the claiming of those dignities and opportunities which are the birthright of every American citizen. Yet the hard historical fact is that self-compensation is essential if he is to escape that social substratum into which a cruel history and an arrogant, avaricious white man have coerced him.

Along with several million Caucasian Americans, most Negroes need a lift from their Government if they are to overcome the handicaps of a tragic history. More than that, however, Negroes need to throw off the white man's domination if they are to discover at last what they can do for themselves unencumbered in an open society.

'Compensation'—Yes

crimination and denial based on the color of his skin.

The facts speak for themselves. Today, the average Negro family earns $3,233, as compared with $5,835 for the white family—a difference of 45 per cent. This gap has widened by two percentage points in the last decade alone. It has widened because the Negro started receiving too little, too late. More than 75 per cent of Negro workers are found in the three lowest occupational categories—service workers, semi-skilled workers, and unskilled and farm labor — the categories most affected by the geometric growth of automation. These same categories include less than 39 per cent of white workers.

By the same token, one out of every six Negro dwellings is substandard, as compared with one in 32 white dwellings. One in every four Negro women with pre-school children is working away from home. Of the school dropouts, 21 per cent are Negro; only 7 per cent of high school graduates are Negroes. Unemployment rates for Negroes are from two and one-half to three times higher than those for white workers.

To overcome these conditions the National Urban League declares that the nation must undertake an immediate, dramatic and tangible "crash program"—a domestic Marshall Plan—to close this intolerable economic, social and educational gap, which separates the vast majority of Negro citizens from other Americans. Unless this is done, the results of the current heroic efforts in the civil-rights movement will be only an illusion, and the struggle will continue, with perhaps tragic consequences.

In its plea for such a domestic Marshall Plan, the Urban League is asking for a special effort, not for special privileges. This effort has been described as "preferential treatment," "indemnification," "special consideration," "compensatory activity." These are "scare" phrases that obscure the meaning of the proposal and go against the grain of our native sense of fair play.

We prefer that our recommendations be seen as necessary and just corrective measures that must be taken if equal opportunity is to have meaning. They are necessary, because only by such means can the majority of Negro citizens be prepared to assume the increased responsibilities that they will face in a more integrated society. They are just, because such an effort alone can repair the devastation wrought by generations of injustice, neglect, discrimination and indifference, based on race.

To put it another way, the scales of equal opportunity are now heavily weighted against the Negro and cannot be corrected in today's technological society simply by applying equal weights. For more than 300 years the white American has received special consideration, or "preferential treatment," if you will, over the Negro. What we ask now is that for a brief period there be a deliberate and massive effort to include the Negro citizen in the mainstream of American life. Furthermore, we are not asking for equal time; a major effort, honestly applied, need last only some 10 years. This crash program must be a cooperative effort by all agencies, institutions and individuals, public and private.

The elements of the crash program, or domestic Marshall Plan, would include:

Education: For the deprived child—Negro as well as white—provision for first-class schools, with the most modern facilities and the best and most experienced teachers. These are necessary to help him realize his potential and prepare him to take advantage of greater educational opportunity. Necessary also is intensified remedial instruction in the lower grades for culturally deprived and retarded pupils. Schools and colleges must find new ways to seek out Negro youths with undeveloped talents. Similarly adult education programs must be expanded and geared to the needs of citizens lacking the basic literary and technical skills.

Employment: A planned effort to place qualified Negroes in all categories of employment, at all levels of responsibility. This would mean that employers would consciously seek to hire qualified Negro citizens and would intensify apprenticeship and training programs to prepare new Negro employes and upgrade those already employed. Labor unions, too, must make a conscientious effort to include Negroes in their membership and training programs.

Further, where Negroes have not been employed in the past at all levels, it is essential that there be conscious preferment to help them catch up. This does not mean the establishment of a quota system—an idea shunned by responsible Negro organizations and leaders. But, because we are faced with the hypocrisy of "tokenism," where the presence of two or three Negro employes is passed off as integration, we are forced, during the transitional stages, to discuss numbers and categories. We demand, in all fairness, that the Negro not be expected to bear the brunt of unemployment.

Housing: Racial ghettos eliminated by providing genuine housing opportunities on the basis of need and financial ability. Programs of redevelopment and relocation, planned to provide both low-income housing and a racial diversity, are needed throughout our communities. This will require the active participation of real estate brokers as well as homeowners.

Health and Welfare: Public and private agencies seeking to provide the best personnel and facilities in low-income neighborhoods, and increased counseling services to troubled families. Here, particularly, the churches and schools must combine efforts to help Negro families develop a deeper sense of parental and community responsibility.

Finally, qualified Negro citizens should be sought and named to public and private boards and commissions, particularly those which shape employment, housing, education, and health and welfare policies. In achieving this objective, we would develop strong, responsible leadership within the Negro community. Also, we would prompt private foundations, business and government to reassess the extent and aims of their financial contributions to established Negro leadership and organizations.

The program outlined here has a simple, practical aim: to provide the Negro citizen with the leadership, education, jobs and motivation that will permit him to help himself. It is not a plea to exempt him from the independence and initiative demanded by our free, competitive society. It makes practical economic sense as a measure to reduce unemployment and welfare costs and to increase our productivity and national income by including Negro citizens in the benefits of our rich society. President Kennedy's economic advisers estimate that our gross national product could be raised 2.5 per cent, were the Negro worker's earnings commensurate with the nation's average.

This program makes historical sense as a rehabilitation of the damage inflicted upon the Negro by generations of injustice and neglect. He, too, has given his blood, sweat and tears to the building of our country; yet, where the labor and initiative of other minority groups have been rewarded by assimilation within the society, the black American has been isolated and rejected.

The domestic Marshall Plan has profound moral and religious justification. Our country is in dire jeopardy as long as it has within its body politic a socially and economically deprived group of citizens, whether they be actually enslaved or denied the full benefits of equality and freedom by an insidious economic and psychological slavery. In this sense, the crash programs that we propose are not an effort to impose the guilt and sins of a past generation on our present white community. This is an appeal for all Americans, working together, to rid present-day America of its sickening disease and its moral shame.

THE Negro is in revolt today, not to change the fabric of our society or to seek a special place in it, but to enter into partnership in that society. It is a revolt with which every American should sympathize. Already a few educational and business institutions are working with intensified effort, special consideration, if you will, in solving this problem. We have the material and spiritual resources as a country to meet the challenge and accomplish the urgent task ahead. All we need is the will to act and the spirit of decency and sacrifice which abounds in our land.

SEVENTEEN STATES VOTE TO DESTROY DEMOCRACY AS WE KNOW IT

HERE IS THE STARTLING STORY OF THIRTEEN MONTHS IN THE 60's

BY THOMAS B. MORGAN

THIS IS A STORY of 13 months in the sixties—July, 1962-August, 1963—13 months of struggle over the substance of American democracy. In this period, a concerted effort was launched which, if successful, could destroy the power and authority of the Government of the United States. The immediate goal is a constitutional convention to propose three amendments to the Federal Constitution that would destroy democracy here as we know it. These are the critical revisions:

Amendment I: State legislatures would win the power to amend the Constitution undeterred by the Congress.

Amendment II: State courts could get full and final jurisdiction over the apportionment of state legislative districts.

Amendment III: A court, composed of the 50 states' chief justices, would get the authority to overrule certain decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

How did these radical amendments come to be the spearheads of a dead-serious political movement? How would they affect our way of life? Will they succeed? The answers to these questions are urgent because, surprisingly, the legislatures of 17 states of the Union now endorse one, two, or all three of these amendments. Here, month by month, is the story:

JULY, 1962 The amendment movement began in Biloxi, Miss., at a routine conference of Southern state officials and legislators organized by the Council of State Governments. The Council is a highly respected joint agency sponsored by the 50 states.

When the conference met, the talk ranged over the Kennedys, desegregation and Cuba, but the chief topic was Baker v. Carr, the historic case decided by the U. S. Supreme Court four months earlier.

In a stunning leap beyond previous decisions, the Court held that apportionment of state legislative districts could be scrutinized by Federal courts. Clearly, many rural legislators, long dominant in state governments, would be reapportioned out of their seats. Even as the Southerners talked, courts in Florida, Oklahoma, Michigan, Wisconsin and Georgia pressed the Baker v. Carr point.

Against odds, Southerners first asked Congress to curb the power of Federal courts

Politicians in many states rumbled that the Supreme Court had gone too far. In Biloxi, the conferees determined to do something about it. And, as it happened, the Florida delegation, with William Chappell, Jr., as its leader, came forward to help guide them.

Chappell is no red-neck. He lives in Ocala, a small town in the mossy, horse-breeding (Needles and Carry Back) country of central Florida. He is fortyish and handsome, a dashing lawyer with offices one flight up on Magnolia Street and a Cessna that he flies to Cape Canaveral and all points, according to clients' needs. He is a ranking Democratic member of his state's legislature; at the last session, he served as Speaker of the House. He considers himself a Goldwater man because "his philosophy comes closest to mine."

"The real issue," Chappell says, "is whether... the states have a function or whether they are political subdivisions of the Federal Government. . . . As a student of the Constitution, I was taught that it was a dual-sovereignty instrument in its inception, that the states were sole depositories of governmental powers and that from the states came the power of the Federal Government." Chappell insists that the Supreme Court has, by "judicial edict and judicial usurpation," unconstitutionally arrogated powers to the Federal Government.

What Chappell calls "usurpation," Justice Arthur J. Goldberg of the Supreme Court calls "judicial review," the authority of the Court to reappraise the constitutionality of laws. "Judicial review," Goldberg told LOOK, "has been a fundamental part of our constitutional construction and interpretation since 1803. The Court isn't immune to criticism—we are in a democracy. But it is the final arbiter of the Constitution, and its decisions must be obeyed unless they are changed by the orderly method prescribed by the Constitution."

To this last, Chappell says amen. Which is why, in July, 1962, in Biloxi, he took the lead in an effort to change the law of the land. Urged on by Chappell and the Floridians, the Biloxi conference produced resolutions asking Congress to prepare two constitutional amendments limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts. Congress, of course, was not expected to pay much attention. The Southerners knew the odds against amending the Constitution. Since 1789, 5,392 amendments have been proposed in Congress; only 23 succeeded. Yet the conferees were undeterred. Some observers saw the proposals as a step toward winning Northern support in the civil-rights struggle. To Chappell, they were a means of grappling with "the real issue."

AUGUST, 1962 Fresh from Biloxi, Chappell appointed two Florida legislative committees, one to study apportionment, the other "dual sovereignty." He wanted more information before the next meeting of state leaders: the 15th annual National Legislative Conference to be held in Phoenix, Ariz., during September under the auspices of the Council of State Governments. Along with other Florida states' rightists, Chappell felt that "something should be visualized that would be brought to the attention of all the 50 states, at the same time, the same hour, to awaken the country."

SEPTEMBER, 1962 About 750 delegates from 46 states gathered for the Phoenix National Legislative Conference. They came from the industrial North as well as the South. They came from the religious prairies and the rightist mountain country. Among them were aggrieved men with power back home—united for "states' rights." They were against integration, the ban on school prayers, reapportionment or the welfare state—but most of all, against the power exercised by the Supreme Court.

The conference chairman was W. Stuart Helm, Republican Speaker of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives. Helm is in his fifties, a small-town, self-made man who works between legislative

A new strategy was developed to "awaken" the American people and alter the Constitution sessions as an executive of the Sun Oil Co. He describes his politics as "conservative." Under his gavel, delegate after delegate took the floor to denounce Baker v. Carr. Many had copies of the Biloxi resolutions. Others had come with their own ideas about amending the Constitution. One was Rep. Warren Wood, four times Speaker of the Illinois House of Representatives and a GOP veteran of 28 years in state politics. His idea was to set up, constitutionally, a Court of the Union composed of chief justices from the 50 states and empowered, upon demand of the legislatures of at least five states, to review decisions of the Supreme Court in cases relating to the rights reserved to the states or to the people.

Then Chappell of Florida stood up and offered his vision of something "to awaken the country." Until he spoke, the conference had seemed inclined to follow the usual procedure—assign a committee to study the situation and report at the next annual meeting in Honolulu, August, 1963. Now, it decided to act.

The conference's Federal-State Relations Committee would draft amendments and plan strategy for calling a constitutional convention. Results would be submitted for action by the biennial General Assembly of the States. The Assembly, sponsored by the Council of State Governments, was scheduled for December in Chicago. Its endorsement might lead directly to official action by the 50 states.

Helm picked the Federal-State Relations Committee. He selected Lloyd Lowrey of California as chairman, plus Chappell, Wood and five other sympathetic legislators. Recently, Helm told LOOK, "I wanted to make sure the committee wasn't stacked solidly against [the Supreme Court]." So, in addition, he named Frank King, minority leader of the Ohio State Senate. Short, fiery and redheaded, King is a former bricklayer who makes part of his living as a vocational teacher in Toledo. He was surprised by the appointment. In his view, "Baker v. Carr is our first chance for democracy in the states."

OCTOBER, 1962 The constitutional-convention idea approved in Phoenix was presented to the Southern Governors' Conference in Hollywood, Fla. The governors knew that the nation had not had a constitutional convention since 1787. Article V of the U. S. Constitution, which was written then, provides for such amending conventions, but this mechanism has never been used. Thus, perhaps assuming the futility of the Phoenix idea, the Southern governors adopted a noncommittal resolution.

America slept through the "day of awakening," but the amendments began to move

NOVEMBER, 1962 The Phoenix Federal-State Relations Committee gathered with the Council of State Governments staff and advisers at Council headquarters in Chicago. Among those present was a dismayed and angry Senator King. "I sat there," he told LOOK, "and listened to what they wanted to do to the Constitution, and I couldn't believe I was in America." Speaker Wood was there, too, for his Court of the Union. In a recent interview, he explained his point of view: "I've taken an oath 19 times to uphold the Constitution," he said, "but I think [centralizing] government means the enslavement of us all."

DECEMBER, 1962 The General Assembly of the States met in Chicago. On hand were 300 delegates, mostly top legislators from 47 states. After less than two hours of debate, they approved the package prepared by the Phoenix Committee and the staff of the Council of State Governments.

They endorsed three proposed amendments to the Constitution:

The first rewrites Article V to create a new amending mechanism —if two thirds of the states submit identical texts of a proposed amendment, Congress need not be consulted, and the amendment is forthwith offered to the states for ratification.

The second prohibits any Federal court from hearing state apportionment cases and provides that "in the apportionment of representation in its legislature," no state can be limited by the United States Constitution.

The third creates machinery for a Court of the Union.

The Assembly strongly supported proposals I and II. It upheld III by a margin of one vote. It also approved the Phoenix Committee's battle plan: All legislatures would "cause themselves" to be in session on Wednesday, January 16, 1963, "for the specific purpose of introducing joint resolutions," memorializing the Congress to call a constitutional convention. These would be adopted "by every state legislature without change," so that the proposed amendments would leave "no question as to the intent of the several states." It was Chappell's dream come true.

JANUARY, 1963 As a scheme "to awaken the country," the day for resolutions was a bust. The New York newspapers were on strike. Elsewhere, most papers buried this story or, like TV and the news magazines, ignored it.

Chappell, Wood and a few others got together a Volunteer Committee on Dual Sovereignty for promotional purposes, with Stuart Helm in Harrisburg, Pa., as chairman and a one-man publicity office in Tallahassee, Fla. The money, what there was, came from interested states and a few individual donors. "It wasn't much," recalls Chappell. Opponents contend that the committee was organized to "sneak" the proposals through the legislatures. But, as Robert Haase, Wisconsin's GOP Speaker of the Assembly and one of the members, said, "What we really want most is to attract attention."

The amendment effort would turn out to be a horse race, but without publicity, legislators could afford to take up the proposals at their own slow gait. Still, Oklahoma acted swiftly. Its resolutions were the first to be passed and filed with Congress. And in New Jersey, Amendments I and II swept through the legislature.

FEBRUARY, 1963 At the first turn, the movement was running nicely. Chappell and Rep. Mallory Horne of Tallahassee led a drive for all three amendments in the Florida legislature. Alabama endorsed the court plan, but took no action on I and II. In Washington, South Carolina's U.S. Sen. Strom

Against the hard-driving amenders, a lone Texan fired a protest

Thurmond, Democrat, tossed I and III into the Senate hopper. "I was not going to introduce the one on reapportionment [II]," Thurmond says, "because I didn't want to acknowledge the Supreme Court."

MARCH, 1963 The movement put on a burst of speed. Idaho, Illinois and Montana filed resolutions with Congress on behalf of I or II or both. Wyoming filed for all three.

APRIL, 1963 "Frankly," says Alabama's Rep. George Grant, Democrat, a 25-year-man in Washington, "50 judges would be unwieldy, but [their] discussions would be interesting. . . ." He introduced I and III. The bills went to committee.

The movement was gaining, yet April was a cruel month. A Yale Law School professor, Charles Black, Jr., a Texan and a member of the New York State Bar, published the first closely reasoned attack on the amendments. Writing in the Yale Law Journal, he hit with humor (III), disdain (II) and anger (I). The Court of the Union idea, he said, "is so patently absurd that it will probably sink without trace." The reapportionment proposal "concerns a special subject" and does not affect "the whole shape of the Union." But, said Black, the suggested innovation in the amending procedure would change "the distribution of ultimate power" in America. It would be a change "of a higher order of importance than any since 1787." The rewrite of Article V would create an amending mechanism that Congress could not control. It would enable "three fourths of the state legislatures, without the consent of any other body," to "change the presidency to a committee of three, hobble the treaty power, make the Federal judiciary elective, repeal the Fourth Amendment, make Catholics ineligible for public office and move the national capital to Topeka. . . ." Three fourths of the legislatures, representing our least populous states, Black said, could give ultimate power to a minority. Assuming the present rural control of most legislatures (and an improbable coalition of the 38 least populous states), "if the proposed Article V were in force, the income tax could be abolished, by repeal of the Sixteenth Amendment, if about 15 percent of the American people were represented by legislators who desired that result."

Black's essay appeared as the newspaper strike ended in New York. It was not long before the New York Times's Supreme Court correspondent, Anthony Lewis, showed the influence of Black's ideas in a story on the proposals, published April 14. In fact, later counter-attacks depended heavily upon Black's essay. Lewis's story meant trouble for the proposed amendments. In the megalopolis between Boston and Washington, and in California, both served by the Times, many people read about I, II, and III for the first time. What the Times did was to make the story fit to print.

"Care to look at the menu?"

"The constitutional lawyers, deans of law schools, and federals in general are waking from a long sleep," wrote Alistair Cooke in the Manchester Guardian Weekly. "All hell will [soon] break loose."

MAY, 1963 All hell failed to break loose. Chief Justice Earl Warren had to speak out, not on the merits of the proposals but on the absence of controversy about them. (He had already spoken on the subject late in April at Duke University, but his remarks had gone almost unreported.) On May 22, addressing the American Law Institute in Washington, Justice Warren said:

"There is a development which . . . could make profound changes in the . . . Constitution." He noted the widespread activity among the states on behalf of the proposals "accomplished with little or no debate and with practically no recognition by the Bar of America."

Warren said that he had been able to find only one article on the subject—by Professor Black in the Yale Law Journal. "If proposals of this magnitude had been made in the early days of the Republic," he declared, "the voices of lawyers . . . would have been heard from one end of our land to the other. . . . Surely the Constitution should be as precious to us now as it was then. If lawyers are not to be the watchmen for the Constitution, on whom are we to rely?"

Meanwhile, Sen. Frank King fought the "toughest battle of my political life" and received credit for blocking the amendments in Ohio. The Toledo Blade, Dayton Journal-Herald, Canton Repository and Cleveland Plain Dealer assailed the amenders. "If it had not been for the press," King told LOOK, "we would have been snowed under."

JUNE, 1963 In the aftermath of the Warren alarm, the amending drive flagged. In New Jersey, U.S. Sen. Clifford Case, Republican, intervened, and the state Senate rescinded its earlier approval of the proposals.

And in Pennsylvania, U.S. Sen. Joseph Clark, Democrat, wrote a letter to every member of the legislature asking them to oppose the amendments. Even with Stuart Helm, chairman of the Volunteer Committee on Dual Sovereignty, as Speaker of the House, only one came out of committee, and there was no floor action on that.

JULY, 1963 Hardly a week passed without a federalist assault on the states' righters. The New York City Bar issued a scathing paper charging that the proposals would "revolutionize our form of government and turn the clock back to the Articles of Confederation of 1777."

Republican Sen. Jacob K. Javits of New York read the Bar's report into the Congressional Record and was "joined in his remarks" by Republican Sen. Leverett Saltonstall of Massachusetts. New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller announced he was opposed, too.

AUGUST, 1963 Almost all the news was bad for the proposed amendments. In Chicago, the American Bar Association voted negative on all three propositions. In Honolulu, the National Legislative Conference, meeting again, failed to endorse the proposals. After that, Brevard Crihfield, executive director of the Council of State Governments and a supporter of I and II, told LOOK: "Now, I don't see how there can be any strong push. I don't see how we can do any more."

movement received a form letter in which, sympathetically, he turned thumbs down on I and III. He favored II, he said, to "restore the situation under which the constitutional authorities, the states, which initially set up the system of representative government, determine the base of apportionment." (Later, Goldwater would say he opposed II as well.) Without Goldwater, most objective observers agreed, the proposed amendments might never win.

At the end of the month, this was the position: 17 states had voted to change the American Federal system.

Proposal I, on the amending process, cleared 12 legislatures: Arkansas, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, Missouri, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas and Wyoming.

Proposal II, on apportionment, passed 13 states: Arkansas, Idaho, Kansas, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

Proposal III, on the Court of the Union, succeeded in five: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, South Carolina and Wyoming.

A few legislatures are in session this fall, many more convene next year, and most will reassemble in 1965 after the elections. But in each, victory would require an effort that hardly seems possible now. Even the men involved seem to have lost their taste for this particular race. Recently, LOOK interviewed four of them.

Wisconsin's Robert Haase said, "No one expected any of these things to come to pass. We wanted to generate concern. . . . No, I don't think much more will come of this."

Illinois's Warren Wood, father of the Court of the Union idea, said. "We died, we bled to get this thing off the ground. Now, I'm not going to do another thing."

Pennsylvania's Stuart Helm said, "We wanted to awaken the country, that's all. There was no conspiracy, no effort to sneak anything, no element of surprise. . . . But, frankly, I was suprised. I never had any idea my picture would ever appear in Time magazine alongside Earl Warren's."

And Florida's William Chappell said, "I only want to play a part in alerting the people. . . . I'm not concerned with these specific amendments. I have absolutely one interest—how we handle and perpetuate what we have received from the Almighty."

So be it.

I SAW A CITY DIE

BIRMINGHAM:

BY CHARLES MORGAN, JR., AS TOLD TO THOMAS B. MORGAN

EDITOR'S NOTE: Last September 15, Cynthia Wesley, 14, Denise McNair, 11, Carol Robertson, 14, and Addie Mae Collins, 14, died in a bomb blast at Birmingham's 16th Street Baptist Church. A white Birmingham lawyer, Charles Morgan, Jr., 33, (above) spoke out the next day. He condemned not only the bombing, but also the negligence of so-called nice people that encourages terrorists. Birmingham, he said, was dead. Here is his post-mortem—and his program for the rebirth of the city.

WHO KILLED BIRMINGHAM? We all did. Not only the hate-filled, demented murderers of four Negro Sunday-school girls, but we "nice people" who did nothing to save our city from race hatred.

Today, Birmingham retains surface manifestations of life. Down in the valley, below iron-rich Red Mountain, traffic moves, shops are open, and our medical center grows. Stubbornly, children go off to school. Men talk of 'Bama football and the Auburn game. And on most days, white and rust-colored plumes of smoke tell the sky that the hearths in our steel mills are fired.

As a Southern city, Birmingham offers neither the easy pleasures of New Orleans nor the healthy bustle of Atlanta. Its downtown is drab, and its air is often heavy with soot. Yet Birmingham inspires love-of-home in most of its 700,000 black and white metropolitan residents.

In many of us, there is an almost fierce loyalty to the city, a sort of noncritical provincialism that says to those who would change things, "You don't like it here. Why don't you leave?" Birmingham is simply "home" to almost everyone who lives there, and a wall of civic conformity protects it from a world with which it does not agree.

But Birmingham steadily contradicts itself. The same people who say, "This race trouble is distorting our image," also say, "I don't care what they think about us in New York (or Paris or Africa)." The same people who want to bring in new industry also want to keep out social changes of the industrial age.

If change is a sign of life, then we in Birmingham have not been very healthy for the 18 years since the end of World War II. The conditions that are producing massive opposition to law and morality today existed in 1945. The only difference is that now they are virtually intractable.

For a time following World War II, hopes were high that

The nice people of Birmingham are safe-as long as Birmingham would recapture the promise of its early years, when it was optimistically called "The Magic City." But Birmingham's rate of economic growth has fallen below the nation's in recent years. Now the harsh fact must be faced: Birmingham is dead. Even if steel-mill sparks still light the sky, the community's life spark has been snuffed out by fear and violence. What has happened here is a timely warning of what can happen anywhere if men and women who say they believe in America's ideals—the good people—will not stand up for their convictions.

Can Birmingham—a New Birmingham—be born again? As one who loves his hometown, his friends and neighbors, I go on hoping this will happen. With help, Birmingham could revive—but past events make possible only the most pessimistic view of the city's future.

Birmingham has done little to save itself. This year, 3½ months went by between the desegregation demonstrations of May and the opening of schools in September. No Negro policemen were hired; no major, and few minor, changes were made. Birmingham dealt with all sorts of civic problems, but hardly discussed the big one, race. Thus, the stage was, and remains, set for racial violence and bloodshed.

Birmingham is a tough city, even in daylight. Any man, white or black, who speaks against segregation lives in fear—fear for himself, for his business and social position and, in some cases, for the safety of his wife and children. The man who never speaks out can say he has never been afraid. And, of course, such a man has nothing to fear—as long as he keeps silent.

Birmingham is no place for the nonconformist. Opinions that run counter to segregationist sentiment can lead to phone calls in the night.

"Is the mortician there yet?" a voice asks me. I say that I don't know any morticians. "Well, you will," the voice says, "when the bodies are all over your front yard." A morbid crank? Perhaps. But friends tell me to "be careful." Others are careful: The names of private citizens who contributed reward money for the capture of the Sunday-school bombers were not published in the papers.

In Birmingham, fear and cowardice have in effect suspended the First Amendment.

THE LAW in Birmingham is white. Even though roughly one third of our people are Negroes, we have had no Negro law officers, no Negro policemen, no Negro sheriff's deputies. Few Negroes serve on juries. Few vote, few practice law, few play a role in the administration of justice.

In the 18 years since World War II, the Birmingham police have failed to solve some 50 anti-Negro bombings and innumerable acts of racist violence. They failed to prevent the Freedom Ride beatings on Mother's Day, 1961, though the riot occurred not far from police headquarters. But they used police dogs and fire hoses on Negro demonstrators in the spring of 1963.

Education in Birmingham prepares our kids for life in a segregated world. That world will be gone by the time tomorrow comes. But our underpaid teachers are bound (as we all are) to a South that never was and never can be.

Birmingham's economy was born of steelmaking. But steel in Birmingham has grown sick with Northern competition, automation and obsolescence. Population is up somewhat. Yet according to Sheldon Schaffer, head of the Industrial Economic Section of Southern Research Institute, our rate of population increase is going down. Employment has declined 10 percent since 1957. And among 53 Southern metropolitan areas checked for manufacturing growth rate, Birmingham ranks 46th. Birmingham must create 8,000 to 10,000 new jobs every year just to keep pace with the rest of America. "Obviously," Schaffer says, "objectives such as these are going to require industrial development efforts that are far more aggressive or imaginative than anything Birmingham or Alabama has ever seen. . . ."

Where are Birmingham's long-promised new plants and industries going to come from? Our business leaders search for new industry—futilely. How many prospects have been frightened away? Ten? Twenty? A hundred? But Birmingham, worried about its "image," is still not concerned enough to do anything about its reality.

The wealth of Birmingham lives in bedroom communities away from the city, away from its smoke, noise and 20th-century problems. To residents of Mountain Brook, Homewood and Vestavia Hills, Birmingham is a burden to be endured eight hours a day, five days a week—but not at night and never on weekends. These people, who earn their livelihoods in Birmingham, are more concerned with "over the mountain" society, country clubs, debutante balls and cocktail parties than with the desperate problems facing the central city.

When, finally, "over the mountain" people became alarmed about the mounting racial crisis, it was too late. The situation was out of hand. The vacuum left by our complacent suburbanites had been filled by extremists. Too late, our "nice people" learned that the whirlwinds of race hate do not stop at suburban boundaries.

The white Christian religion in Birmingham boasts more than 400 churches. Our ministers talked of love—in general terms. But they also waited too long to speak against hate. Their sermons have dealt with symptoms, but rarely with the issue—how to inject the doctrine of the brotherhood of man into the stream of everyday life. Not many have taken equality for their text. Few have said clearly and unmistakably that prejudice is wrong, bigotry is evil, and the Christian religion has something to do with Christianity.

Under the pressure of events, culture retreats in Birmingham. The city has a civic symphony, civic-theater groups, an art museum, a botanical garden and a zoo. But the Broadway road shows are not coming to Birmingham. And our Music Club season of evening concerts almost failed this year because of ticket cancellations. Many people in Birmingham are afraid to go out after dark.

Professional hatemongers feel at home in Birmingham. Many of them live here. It follows that ours is a city in which armed guards protected temple doors and patrolled temple grounds on a 24-hour watch during recent Jewish services.

For generations, politics in our city has been firmly dominated by hard-line segregationists. We produced former Police Commissioner Eugene (Bull) Connor and former Mayor Art Hanes, who adheres to a simple thesis: Desegregation is Communist-inspired. Meanwhile, Atlanta kept electing Mayor William B. Hartsfield, who said his city was "too busy to hate," and elsewhere across the new South, moderates captured many city halls.

This year, Birmingham turned out its Connor-influenced government in favor of Mayor Albert Boutwell and a "moderate" city council. But the defeated are still politically potent, and the new city administration has proven hesitant and faltering on the race issue.

Birmingham's mass media have fallen victim to the city's plague of intolerance. There are always excuses, but few TV shows dealing with the race crisis have been seen in Birmingham. On at least one occasion, community leaders were called to view ABC's Walk in My Shoes privately. Similarly, in one of our newspapers, we read Harry Ashmore's series on the Negro in the North. But his articles on the Negro in the South were not run. The Birmingham News has been bitterly attacked whenever it urged a counsel of reason in dealing with the city's festering race problem. An iron curtain has descended, aimed at keeping out information that might upset the racial status quo. How could the people be expected to face their problems? Many of them are only now beginning to find out what the problems are.

HATE AND FEAR have helped bring death to the spirit of Birmingham. Yet certain other motives in the short, unhappy history of Birmingham have perhaps been even more crucial. The town was born in 1871 and grew fitfully, a rough and bawdy mining town where the few might grow wealthy on the sweat of the many.

Outside interests moved in after the turn of the century, permanently removing control of Birmingham's most important single industry—steel—to the North. Birmingham made good its boast that it had the cheapest labor supply in the country, but only by fighting a pitched battle with organized labor and by manipulating the "nigger menace" to prevent union organization. To this day, although local union leadership is generally rather liberal, the unions themselves have taken few progressive steps in the field of race. The leaders are afraid to risk defeat on the race question. And some, in the craft unions, have consistently backed Bull Connor and other segregationists.

Ironically, Birmingham today remains dependent on the very "outside" Northern interests it holds in contempt. The truth is that were it not for "outsiders" and "Yankees," there would never have been a modern Birmingham. The city was a child of Reconstruction, came late to America's industrial expansion and still is, in 1963, a poor relation of businesses concentrated in the North. Thus, it is possible to understand Birmingham, if not to absolve it, for its principal failing: the inability of its people to accept responsibility for its present condition. They have yet to embrace the credo of another Southerner, Thomas Jefferson, that all men are created equal and are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights.

In Birmingham, we blame the Kennedys, Khrushchev, Martin Luther King, "outside agitators," the press—everyone except ourselves.

Who else should be blamed? Politicians whose mishandling of the race issue has been a major factor in the breakdown of law and order. Every Northerner who ever let a friend from Birmingham absolve himself of guilt by agreeing with him about "the niggers." Every Negro maid who ever lied to her white employer, telling her how happy she was with segregation. Every businessman and labor leader, North and South, who has failed to use all his influence in Birmingham,

among employees, associates and friends, to safeguard the rights of other Americans.

None of us in Birmingham has done as much as we could. But it should not be forgotten that we are ourselves subject to the foreboding power of a state administration totally dedicated to the maintenance of segregation "today . . . tomorrow . . . and forever." To countervail this power, there is, of course, the Federal Government. But in today's Birmingham, resentment runs deep against Washington. And little help has come from private sources, from labor and banking and industry—from the corporate conscience of the country.

Birmingham did not get into this fix alone, and it will not get out of it alone. The city's two daily newspapers are owned by Northern-oriented publishers—the Scripps-Howard and the Newhouse chains. Our two television stations are similarly owned, one by Newhouse, one by Taft Broadcasting, based in Cincinnati. Our biggest employer, Tennessee Coal & Iron, is owned lock, stock and mill by U.S. Steel. Any solution for Birmingham must be national as well as local.

Consider the steel industry. It has extracted great wealth from Birmingham. What is its responsibility in our community's struggle with bigotry and hatred? U.S. Steel has opened up more and more jobs to Negroes. But is that enough? Is the steel industry exerting its influence to bring about a solution to Birmingham's race problem?

And what could Scripps-Howard do about the Birmingham Post-Herald's role in helping solve our racial problems? Properly, most newspaper chains allow great latitude in local control of their properties. Yet our Post-Herald seems to follow Scripps-Howard's general editorial line on such issues as taxation, national leadership and foreign relations. Our paper goes along—until it comes to the race issue. Here, the Post-Herald for many years maintained a strong segregationist position. That point of view certainly has a right to be heard. But what is the responsibility of the officers of Scripps-Howard in New York? Must they allow one of their papers to label want ads "colored" and "white"? limit coverage of Negro community life to little more than a once-a-week column? operate in a town with a quarter of a million Negroes but not have a single full-time Negro on the editorial staff? and editorially endorse segregation?

For example, during the critical early stage of biracial meetings to end last spring's Negro demonstrations, the Post-Herald's contribution was an editorial implying that Dr. King was reaping profits from race turmoil. No doubt the city's racist intransigents were pleased with the editorial, but it could not possibly have helped mediators in their difficult assignment. Next day, the paper said it "intended no such inference," but the incident did nothing to close our racial breach.

Moderates in the North as well as the South have stood by while Birmingham has been torn apart. Like the "over the mountain" people in Birmingham, they are concerned about order, but not about law. The South had an ordered society for 200 years; now that order conflicts with law. What do the moderates do about it? Isn't it time that they concerned themselves with the local policies of their companies, especially when these policies give aid and comfort to the enemies of our system of justice?

What happens next in Birmingham? The present course may result in more riot, violence and tragedy. But it is not beyond the realm of possibility that something can be done to revive the city. If ten men from around the country could sit down at a table to consider our problems, they could do wonders for Birmingham. They could reaffirm facts Birmingham itself has never faced: that desegregation is the law of the land, and that the life of a city depends on its citizens' respect for law. These men could then bring together a powerful team—of the press, of communications, of steel, of electric power, gas, construction, the banks, organized labor and the Federal Government—to resuscitate Birmingham.

After his "Birmingham is dead" speech, Charles Morgan, Jr., received a card from a local man, summing up the sentiment of most letter writers—but some were crudely abusive.

NOTHING SHORT of a total national effort can help Birmingham now. Only the concern of the American people—and those American business leaders whose decisions shape our city's economy—can revive Birmingham. Only "outsiders"—not those interested merely in the wealth of our soil, but those who care about the moral well-being of our people—can strike the spark of life. Birmingham is dead—but can America afford not to breathe new life into the city?

Given outside help, what can we do to recreate Birmingham? I know that we need at least the following program:

1. We need biracial committees to work on common solutions for common community problems—from air-pollution control to medical care for the poor and aged. Such committees would provide avenues for peaceful desegregation of many areas of public life.

2. We need a desegregated interfaith alliance of ministers, priests and rabbis backed and coordinated by state and national church organizations, bishops and others in the hierarchical chain. They could pledge to each other and to their faiths that they will preach for and organize the removal of racial restrictions from the life of the community and the church.

3. We need an alliance of businessmen representing our major locally and nationally owned enterprises. With their influence, they, too, can open channels of communication. And with policies that favor desegregation and encourage employees to participate in the desegregation movement, they can set an example for the city.

4. We need to open the editorial pages of Birmingham's newspapers to columnists who favor and discuss desegregation, to provide employment opportunities for Negro reporters and to desegregate every aspect of newspaper life.

5. We need to schedule TV programs that present the problem of race in Birmingham and the nation to our people so that they may know the aspirations of Negroes and learn about solutions.

6. We need public-school courses on democracy, the fundamentals of law, and the facts of the race problem—in an attempt to bring forward an unprejudiced younger generation.

7. We need adult-education programs sponsored by labor organizations. We need apprentice programs and private employment opportunities open to Negroes and whites alike.

8. We need to remove barriers to Negro employment and other discriminations against Negroes by municipal and county government. We need to hire Negroes for the Birmingham police force and the Jefferson County Sheriff's Department. We need to restore the confidence of the Negro community in the desire and ability of the city to enforce the law with fairness and impartiality.

9. We need renewed voter-registration efforts in order to provide Birmingham's Negro population with its proportionate voice in the political life of the community.

10. By legislative action or otherwise, we need to merge suburban residential communities into the City of Birmingham so that, economically, suburbanites will belong to their city.

11. We need self-imposed restraint on the race question by reasonable men in the political arena. Politicians and lawyers must face up to their responsibilities and seek solutions to problems before new crises develop. Similarly, businessmen in their search for new industry must worry less about the city's "image" and more about its ability to answer the needs of all its people. Let them lead and industry will follow.

These things we need. Birmingham can't live without them. END

New CORE Tactic on the Coast Shifts Goods on Stores' Shelves

By LAWRENCE E. DAVIES

Special to The New York Times

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 27—A group of demonstrators for the Congress of Racial Equality introduced a new protest tactic to the San Francisco Bay area today.

Successively nine persons entered two Berkeley establishments of Lucky Stores, Inc., and performed what Lew Mascola, one store manager, described as "a cross-filing job."

This meant, he said, that they shifted items about on the shelves and counters, putting soap, for example, with fresh vegetables.

This followed a daily "shop in" at San Francisco and Berkeley stores, a tactic that was called off in San Francisco after more than a week of operation had produced strong differences of opinion within the Negro community.

It worked in this way:

Demonstrators entered a Lucky Store, took armloads of food from shelves, placed it in carts and went to the checkout counters.

There the checkers computed the cost and placed the groceries and meat in bags. The demonstrators walked off, leaving behind the filled bags and paying no money.

In Berkeley, students of the University of California who take exception to the tactic have been following the "purchasers" to the checkout counters, collecting bags and replacing the goods on the shelves.

This method also was followed by students of the University of San Francisco during some of the "shop in" demonstrations here.

Stores Accused

The tactic was introduced to call attention to what CORE charged was the failure of Lucky Stores to live up to an agreement on hiring practices.

Mayor John F. Shelley of San Francisco tried last night to achieve a solution of the dispute and promised further sessions.

The San Francisco protests, James Farmer, national director of CORE, said today in Sacramento, have served their purpose: with Lucky Stores on Negro hiring.

William Bradley, chairman of the San Francisco CORE, had announced termination of the demonstrations here at a meeting with officials of the Baptist Ministers Union, who had criticized the "shop-ins" as "more destructive than constructive."

"We recognize," Mr. Bradley sad, "that the shop-in has not been an overly popular tactic and that well-meaning citizens might oppose it. But it didn't create any ill will in the community that didn't already exist."

Mr. Bradley asserted that four months ago Lucky Stores had agreed to hire more Negroes. Since then, he said, of 320 new clerks hired, only 18 have been Negroes. The corporation has denied discriminatory practices.

'Socrates of the Civil Rights Movement'

by Nat Hentoff

Within a recent ten-day period, Bayard Rustin, a tall, crisp, prodigiously energetic civil rights activist, was on a characteristic round of assignments. He spoke at Middlebury College in Vermont to a group of students interested in starting a "direct action" group, lectured at a meeting of the Eastern Sociological Society in Boston, met with Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee workers from Mississippi, spent two days at Lincoln University to help co-ordinate planning for demonstrations in southern Pennsylvania, appeared at a symposium on poverty at Howard University with Michael Harrington and Leon Keyserling, worked out a strategy for presentation to the major civil rights groups for counter-demonstrations against the Senate filibuster underway at the time, and conferred in New York with units of CORE, the NAACP and the Citywide Committee for Integrated Schools to devise additional ways of pressuring the Board of Education to respond to their demands.

Despite his formidable range of activities, Rustin cannot be accurately categorized as a "Negro leader" in the traditional sense of that term. He is not a member of or otherwise officially affiliated with any of the civil rights organizations or any political party. Accordingly, he has no visible base of power.

And yet, within "the movement," Rustin's influence is strong and rising. He is, for example, consulted on nearly every major project planned by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee ("Snick," as its members call it). Dr. Martin Luther King, for whom Rustin was a principal adviser from 1955 to 1960, describes him as the "architect" of King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference and continues to call on Rustin for counsel on strategy. In addition, Rustin is particularly close to A. Philip Randolph, international president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and beyond question the single most respected figure among all sections of "the movement." It was because he had Randolph's support that Rustin was able to fuse all the major civil rights organizations into last August's March on Washington—the idea for which Rustin had himself initiated.

Yet another area in which Rustin has considerable influence is among the younger, second-echelon leadership of CORE and the NAACP. The established civil rights leaders—James Farmer, Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young—have ambivalent feelings about Rustin because he is continually prodding them into directions for which they are not always prepared. They also share intermittent annoyance, and perhaps a degree of envy, at a man who, unlike themselves, is not bound by the responsibilities and the conflicting internal pressures to which leaders or organizations are subject. Rustin is under no one's discipline but his own.

Rustin, moreover, is a different order of man from Wilkins, Farmer or Young—more daring and far-ranging in his strategy, more radically analytical and more personally charismatic. Few civil rights leaders, Martin Luther King excepted, can equal Rustin's fiery forensic skills at public meetings and his compelling persuasiveness at small gatherings of militant actionists.

"Although they're never quite sure what to make of him, they do listen to him," a young official of CORE told me not long ago as he assessed Rustin's relationship with the major civil rights leaders. "At crucial times in the history of the movement he's been the only man capable of maneuvering all the major groups into presenting a unified image. He did it for the March on Washington. He did it in 1958 for the first Youth March on Washington for integrated schools. The NAACP was hostile to the idea but Bayard convinced A. Philip Randolph it would work and eventually the NAACP came into line.

"In 1960," the CORE executive continued, "when there was tremendous pressure on the leadership not to do anything at either major party convention, Bayard forced them to call what turned out to be one of the biggest civil rights demonstrations in the North up to that time—8,000 pickets at the Democratic convention in Los Angeles and 10,000 at the Republican convention in Chicago. But while he does play that kind of unifying role, Bayard is also of great tactical assistance to the most militant of the younger activists, to those of us who want to push faster and deeper than the established leadership is ready to. I mean in terms of nonviolent action. He's been very helpful to many of us in analyzing the flexibility and potentialities of nonviolent techniques."

Rustin is scornful of talk of violence in any form as a realistic tactic in the civil rights struggle. Last September, for example, he was among the speakers at a meeting called at New York's Community Church on East 35th Street both to analyze the future of the civil rights campaign and to protest the deaths by bombing of four Negro children in Birmingham. Among those in the packed auditorium were Muslims and representatives of other black nationalist groups as well as young members of CORE and the NAACP. There was an almost palpable undercurrent of anger and frustration. As Rustin, in his clipped, quasi-British accent, began to focus on the need for his listeners to go beyond civil rights into "a struggle for a new political, social and economic order in this country," he suddenly pointed a long finger at the audience and shouted, "If there is anyone here who advocates violence as a solution, let him stand up!" No one rose to the challenge. "Let him stand up," Rustin added bitingly, "and I will show you someone who proposes to do nothing."

Rustin's own commitment to nonviolent direct action for social change goes back through a long apprenticeship in peace and civil rights work, preceded by a brief, utterly disillusioning detour into the Young Communist League. Born in 1910 in West Chester, Pennsylvania, Rustin was raised by his grandfather. At West Chester high school, he was an outstanding athlete, particularly in track, football and tennis. Also on the scholastic honor roll, Rustin went on to attend a series of colleges. Among them were Wilberforce University in Ohio, the state teachers' college at Cheyney, Pennsylvania, the City College of New York and the London School of Economics. (In London, Rustin's accent, already shaped by his West Indian heritage, took on additional British cadences.) He never stayed long enough at any one place to receive a degree, preferring instead to move wherever his developing interests led him.

From 1936 to 1941, Rustin was a member of the Young Communist League. As a Quaker in search of collective action, he had joined because he thought the Communists were opposed to war and discrimination. "By 1941," Rustin recalls, "it was inescapably clear that I had been wrong." In that year, he went to work for the Fellowship of Reconciliation, a non-denominational pacifist organization. There he functioned first as a field secretary and then as race relations secretary. In the latter capacity, Rustin helped organize chapters throughout the country of the Congress of Racial Equality, which had been formed in 1942 by a group including several staff members of the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

In 1947, Rustin helped organize and participated in the first "freedom ride" into the South—an integrated "journey of reconciliation" which resulted in Rustin serving 22 days on a North Carolina chain gang for violating bus seating laws in that state. Since then, Rustin has been arrested 22 times in civil rights demonstrations—most recently on the opening day of the World's Fair during a sit-in with James Farmer of CORE and others before the New York City Pavillion. He also spent 28 months in a Federal penitentiary during the Second World War because as an absolutist pacifist, he would neither go into the armed forces nor engage in alternative service.

By 1953, Rustin had become executive secretary of the War Resisters League, a pacifist group whose membership encompasses non-religious as well as religious objectors to war. He has spent the past decade racing between peace and civil rights assignments. In his role as peace agitator, Rustin helped organize the first Aldermaston March in England in 1955, was a leader of an Afro-European team protesting French atomic testing in the Sahara in 1960; and in the following year he functioned as an advance man in Europe for the San Francisco to Moscow Peace Walk. His peace projects have also taken him to India where he studied the Gandhi movement for a year and a half.

In this country, as a civil rights strategist, in addition to advising Martin Luther King during the Montgomery bus boycott and in the years immediately afterwards, Rustin has been pervasively active in organizing direct action projects and in lecturing at institutes on nonviolent resistance. He was also secretary of a committee set up by A. Philip Randolph to protest discrimination in the armed forces, and it was largely pressure by the committee that resulted in the Truman executive order of 1949 barring such discrimination.

Although Rustin's time in recent years has been increasingly consumed by civil rights activities—he is currently on an extended leave of absence from his regular position at the War Resisters League—Rustin does remain a leading tactician in the peace movement, internationally as well as nationally. This past January, just before beginning intensive organization of the first New York City public school boycott, Rustin attended a two-day conference in Tyringe, Sweden, of the International Confederation for Disarmament and Peace, a unit formed last year as a counter-force to the Communist-influence World Peace Council. At the conference, Rustin—along with Homer Jack, Executive Director of SANE—was elected to the 15-man governing council of the International Confederation.

Rustin's scope of activity—geographic as well as ideological—obviously requires unusual resources of energy. The only visible effects of the unremitting burden of his schedule are the nearly constant presence of a Pall Mall in his hand and occasional gusts of asperity. Rustin is an imposing figure. A little over six feet, his flaring thicket of greying black hair makes him appear taller. His eyes drill into a questioner, and his brisk speech and penchant for incisive analysis leave little room for small talk—except among friends, with whom he is a skillful, slicingly witty raconteur.

". . . Bayard Rustin is not officially affiliated with any of the civil rights organizations or any political party. Yet within 'the movement' his influence is strong and rising . . ."

Although committed to nonviolence as a way of life as well as a tactic, Rustin does not mute verbal aggressiveness when annoyed in the middle of a project. During the March on Washington, an emissary of CBS News officiously broke into a conversation Rustin was having with his aides and proclaimed, "Our cameras are ready for you, Mr. Rustin, if you'll step this way." Rustin frowned and, his accent more clipped than usual, snapped, "I simply have no time for this sort of diversion. If CBS wants me, they'll have to come to me." CBS came.

A few months ago, a Harlem street rally which Rustin had organized began to be disrupted as several mounted policemen suddenly appeared. Some members of the crowd, anticipating being charged on, started to panic. Rustin stepped into the middle of the street, raised his hand, (Continued on next page)

'Socrates of the Civil Rights Movement'

(Continued from page 7) and shouted, "Get off those damn horses. You're only making things worse." The first two horsemen, possibly stunned by the authoritative thrust of Rustin's command, did dismount, and the situation became much calmer.

Even in a state of relative repose, Rustin projects a crackling energy and buoyancy which implement his self-description as a "pragmatic optimist." Recently, Rustin's optimism was tested when he was asked to analyze the increasingly diffuse state of Negro leadership in New York City. A picture in the morning papers had shown Reverend Milton Galamison, Malcolm X and Adam Clayton Powell in apparent concord if not in a firm alliance. Powell, moreover, had denounced the leaders of CORE, the NAACP and the Urban League for having "sold out" the city's Negroes.

"There was a vacuum," Rustin began, "into which such new leaders as Galamison and Jesse Gray, the rent strike organizer, moved. The great 'liberation' date seemed to have been 1954, but ten years after the Supreme Court's school decision, there are more segregated schools and housing and more Negro unemployment. And that leads to fantastic frustration. In New York, the established leadership of CORE and the NAACP did not develop a program for the masses of Negroes on a day-to-day basis nor did it organize them block by block to deal with their most concrete problems. But Jesse Gray did strike deeply into those masses because he was working on the basic level of the filth and rats with which they live. Galamison touched the masses through their children. Malcolm X, on the other hand, is generating a great deal of interest but the real extent of his influence depends on whether he develops a realistic program. On his record so far, I doubt that he's capable of it, but you never can tell."

Although Rustin had collaborated with Reverend Galamison on the first school boycott, he did not participate in the second. "The nature of Galamison's leadership," Rustin said, "made it difficult for most other groups to join him because he insisted on arriving at decisions without consultation, and in many other respects he behaves erratically. Yet he does have great tenacity and he is largely responsible for the intensity of focus which now exists on the school problem.

"You see," Rustin lit a cigarette, "there are two kinds of leadership. One is for the pull up—dynamic, vigorous, uncompromising. During that stage, for instance, that kind of leader demands every school in the city be integrated by such-and-such a date. Eventually, however, you reach a point at which it's necessary to drop sloganism and negotiate seriously with a serious plan. For this second stage, the leadership has to be capable of exercising great care. At present, we are in between those two stages, and that's another reason for the confusion."

Rustin has particular confidence that the rising young potential leaders in CORE, the NAACP and SNCC will ultimately bring a great deal more unity to Negro action for change. "In the North as well as in the South," he points out, "we are now getting more and more young activists, many of them off the streets of the ghetto rather than from the middle-class, who are more advanced than the established leadership in terms of strategic concepts and in terms of their awareness of the fundamental problems in making equality meaningful. These young people are our major hope, and that's why I've always kept myself surrounded with them. I throw a great deal of responsibility on them, sometimes more than they're fully capable of handling, so that they can experience the problems of the leadership which is going to be theirs. When they come to me with their own plans, I do try to show them their errors but I am very careful not, as the Quakers put it, to 'sit on the spirit.' They can only learn from their mistakes."

East River CORE is a New York group which has presented Rustin with its designs for demonstrations before making final decisions. Tina Lawrence, a former secretary of Rustin who became active in East River CORE, describes Rustin as the "Socrates of the movement." When plans are outlined to him, Miss Lawrence explains, "Bayard throws out the most disturbing questions. If our arguments aren't sound, he blows holes in them. There's no one else in the movement who is as relentless as he is in making us think for ourselves."

There are times, however, when Rustin's Socratic advice is not heeded. "When East River CORE," Rustin observes, "decided to tie up traffic on Triborough Bridge, I felt it was a tactical mistake to demonstrate for better schools at a bridge. Most of the people you're trying to reach simply can't make that kind of connection and they get more confused. But I didn't tell them not to do it. And they learned some things. They learned that if you don't want people to throw garbage at you—as some of the motorists did—you shouldn't bring it with you. They also learned that they should have left some passage open for those who might have been taken ill or for a woman who might have been about to have a baby. There is no reason to create unnecessary antagonism in a demonstration.

"On the other hand," Rustin emphasizes, "I've learned that there are times when I'm wrong. Each generation has its own insights. When the sit-in movement began to spread a few years ago, I had very serious questions as to whether it could spread fast and I thought at first that it would have been wiser in any case to move more slowly and stay longer in each locality to build local organizations. Yet the sit-ins did spread rapidly, and as a result, they created a much more intense national consciousness of the problem than would have been possible if the youngsters had taken my advice.

Rustin was wrong more recently when he anticipated that the May 18 March for Democratic Schools which he organized for the NAACP and CORE would bring out more than 15,000 supporters for the day's climax in front of City Hall. In March of this year, some 15,000 members of PAT (Parents and Taxpayers), who oppose the civil rights groups' plans to integrate the public school system, had converged on City Hall; and accordingly, Rustin conceded before May 18 that if the NAACP-CORE demonstration did not attract at least 15,000 "plus one," it would be a failure. Less than 5,000 came.

"There is no way of denying it was a failure," Rustin said a few days after the March for Democratic Schools. "What that failure revealed was that many had come to the point at which they felt marching in the streets could not get them what they wanted in that area. And that is why political action must be the next major step. I don't mean the formation of a new party, but rather the creation of a great consensus on basic economic issues—a consensus on which candidates can be elected. And here again, it is the young who will provide the thrust toward political action in 'the movement.'"

"As these young people continue to gain experience and power," Rustin asserts, "they will attract more and more of the grass roots kind of support which Reverend Galamison and Jesse Gray have already begun to draw on. East River CORE, for instance, not only demonstrates on Triborough Bridge but is also organizing the people in its area on a block-by-block basis for action on housing, education and employment. And it is this kind of young leadership which will be much more effective than that of Galamison and Gray because it will be more knowledgeable about the broader political and economic changes that are essential. Youngsters like those in East River CORE are learning, for example, that for Negroes to get jobs, the economy must be expanded so that there are also jobs for the white unemployed.

"Meanwhile," Rustin adds, "the pressure from these young organizers as well as from the Galamisons and Grays will force the NAACP, CORE and the Urban League to take more radical positions. By 'radical' I mean getting at the root of things. As this happens on a greater and greater scale, there will then be stability and unity among the civil rights forces."

As Rustin envisions the future, there will be little place for such figures as Adam Clayton Powell. "The Powell-type," Rustin insists, "is a product of the ghetto, as were the Italian and Irish machine politicians before him. When the people in the ghetto really begin to organize for radical action, they will reject his leadership because he does not understand the degree of change—in our values as well as in our economy—that must come if this revolution is to be finished."

Rustin on some other leaders of 'the movement':

Adam Clayton Powell . . . "is a product of the ghetto. When the people of the ghetto organize for radical action, they will reject him."

Milton Galamison . . . "touched the masses through their children. He is largely responsible for the intensity of focus on the school problem."

Jesse Gray . . . "struck deeply into the masses of Negroes because he was working on the basic level of filth and rats with which they live."

Malcolm X. . . . "The real extent of his influence depends on whether he develops a realistic program. On his record so far, I doubt that he's capable of it, but you can never tell."

In what may turn out to be his most influential activity so far in "the movement," Rustin has been persuading young militants throughout the country to learn more than just techniques for nonviolent direct action. "Study," he told a SNCC conference in Washington last fall. "Read. Formulate an over-all social and political reform program that will not only help Negroes but that will help all Americans." Rustin was instrumental in setting up a series of weekend leadership training institutes this winter at Nyack, New York, under the auspices of the League for Industrial Democracy. There, from 20 to 30 young members of CORE along with a few from HARYOU (Harlem Youth Opportunities Unlimited) were instructed by volunteer professors and labor officials in basic economic theory, American political and social history and the history of the labor movement. Similar institutes are being planned (Continued on page 57)

NOTES FROM THE OTHER SIDE OF APRIL:

BY GREGORY CORSO

I will try to relate to the best of my memory all my occasions of the Negro, the American Negro. My memory of him is not an entirely painful one. There were times of pleasantness, of joy. It doesn't take much to recall the pleasant and ordinary, but to tell of what was surely my saison en enfer . . . it means going back to the pain, tears, fears, and anger of that terrible year.

THE YEAR THAT WAS THE WHOLE WORLD'S HELL

It was the year of 1943, and 1943 was a bad year for the whole world. I was thirteen years old, my father in the Navy, my mother long since gone; I was homeless, and lived with the alley cats in the wild and wonderful New York City streets. I was arrested for kicking in a neighborhood tailor-shop window and helping myself to a couple of suits many sizes too big for me; I sold one, and wore the other, cuffs rolled up. It wasn't much of a coincidence the tailor spotted me wearing the crime. I was sitting on a Lower East Side stoop talking about Batman when I saw him see me; God how he sweated and how his eyes popped! He knew the suit (I don't know if I had taste or not at that age, but I doubt I would have picked out a maroon suit had I the grace of purchasing instead of stealing one); anyway, even though I knew he detected me, I didn't run from that stoop; I sat there, and was still talking about Batman when he zoomed back with two fat cops. The tailor pressed charges against me—thus my first involvement with the law, and it started off a time of shuffling back and forth, between the Youth House (a detention home for juvenile delinquents) to the courts, to one day of freedom (I asked the judge to send me back to my foster parents, he complied, but they declined me), and back again to the Youth House. Bad boys of sixteen or less were sent there. It was a busy place in 1943.

It was the beginning of the New York City juvenile-gang era, when city children warred against each other while their fathers and elders fought on a real front thousands of miles away. Both fronts were dangerous. They were mostly Negro gangs; there were the Comanches, the Apaches, the Lucky Gents. Membership ranged from men in their fifties, called Seniors, down to boys in their early teens, called Tiny Tims. Even girls belonged and called themselves Debs. The youngest of these gangs, the Tiny Tims, inevitably ended up, at some time or another, in the Youth House; not just one or two at a time, but ten or twenty at a time. They were wild and crazy and fearless; indeed they were the most feared—and it was that part of the gang I encountered there.

Up to that time I knew only those Negroes of my childhood who gave me sodas and didn't mind my reading their comics or eating their cakes (as you will soon see)—or those drunken Negroes I used to see on the Bowery, or the caricature of him eating watermelon, or that Willie Something-or-other of the movies always trembling like an autumn leaf when ghosts appeared. How different the Youth House Negroes! I now roomed with fifty of them, and all of them Tiny Tims, each boasting God knows how many stomps and rumbles. That's all they ever did, they boasted about how many foes they cut up or zip-gunned, and when they weren't boasting they were threatening, and planning war councils. But there were two whites to twenty Negroes in that place, and when a Tiny Tim threatened you, he threatened you with his twenty pairs of fists and feet. From them I learned, beside anguish and fear, a new language—the Negro jargon, now spoken by all hipsters, black or white. The only difference being that when they spoke it there was no wit, no depth. I didn't understand most of what they were saying. There was very little we had in common.

Neither was I affiliated with any gang (which they kept insisting that I was . . . I think it was the Italian Sabres . . . because I was silly enough to say I was Italian). Nor did I much relish violence, though I lived in a violent atmosphere, preferring pigeons (I had about two hundred on one of the highest roofs on the Lower East Side) and stamps, and Benjamin Franklin. At thirteen I thought Ben Franklin to be maybe one of the greatest people that ever lived. I hardly ever talked at the Youth House, but regardless of my reticence, I got involved in terrible fights. Not the kind I was accustomed to in school—one against one. Here you had to fight for your life; and when I went down, that's when the feet started to fly—like a flock of blackbirds. It wasn't Gregory they were fighting though—it was White Boy.

The only time of peace came at night, sleeping time. I slept in a room with another white boy, and the door to the room had a lock; but the second month I was put in a room without a lock—and that was the worst time of all—they'd come in, about two or three in the morning, and jump on us and pummel us with heavy angry fists. God how they must have hated the white.

I think there is only one place other than Harlem that a Negro is in the majority in New York City and that is in jail. I had to get out of there. And somehow I found a way how to. Even the guard was Negro in that Youth House, but I was less scared of him, so one early morning, when even the most violent of human souls must give in to sleep, I snuck up to that guard and stole the master key. I was on the top floor, so the best way out was up, via the roof.

I let five Negroes in on my plan, and for some odd Freudian reason two of the five were my worst antagonists (I guess that was my only way of getting to them). Once on the roof, all we had to do was scramble down the fire hose coiled on the stairway wall—freedom was three stories down to an adjacent roof.

But once we were out there under the early Sunday morning sky I got so elated, so happy to be leading this expedition and working with my tormentors, that I offered to hold the hose for them because there was nowhere to attach it. I watched them make their escape—fast they went, out and back into that white world where, and I actually thought this: they couldn't be as tough any more. Suddenly I found myself holding the hose. I looked about on the roof for a place to tie it to; there was no place. Three stories down wasn't so bad, but if you didn't jump right you could go all the way. So I sat there literally half the day, looking down at my shoes on the roof below, where I'd thrown them to give me encouragement. . . . I was all alone, and what with all that sky and just me, I felt very all alone and scared—and it was Sunday, and Sunday was always the quietest and loneliest and scariest time of life—so I just sat there, and cried. They took me back downstairs finally, back down to more beatings and woe. One day I just flipped, putting both hands through a huge windowpane when a bunch of Comanches began to attack me. They all backed away, and there I stood, screaming at them with my skinny arms bleeding galore. That "mad" act got me sent to the Children's Observation Ward at Bellevue Hospital.

If it weren't for the Negro I would never have seen the most awful human misery imaginable. At the Children's Observation Ward there were old men. Calm yet unhealthy old men. But I was young and playful and mischievous, so one day I balled a piece of white bread the size of a pea, and flipped it into the air. It hit an old man on the head, and God O God the screams that ensued! It was like a time bomb set off, a chain reaction, everybody started to scream along with him, the big guards in white came rushing in, and the old man whom I struck pointed at me, a black old man! That did it; I was whisked off to The Mad Violent Ward of Bellevue. It was there the thirteen-year-old came of age, and quick.

WITH NEGRO EYES, WITH WHITE

FOUR MOMENTS FROM A POET'S LIFE, WHEN THE WORLD WAS REDUCED TO BLACK AND WHITE, AND AS SWIFTLY ILLUMINATED

Men in sheets sitting hunched in corners their skin peeling off; men in sheets squeaking like mice; men in sheets peeing on other men; "he butchered his wife and three kids" is all I can remember being told by one of them. I wrote a poem about the place, about some guy who painted portraits. It went like this: "You don't paint nice,/you paint faces on window shades,/and you don't make them look nice." He replied: "Window shades is all I got, and faces is all I got." No sadder vision do I have of myself than myself crouched on the floor on which neglected checkers are scattered about, face pressed against an inch of open window with tears streaming from my eyes, my nose, my mouth. I don't know how long I was there; that it was summer and that I was thirteen I am sure. And though I hold my heart to be grown, it holds, some twenty years later, no bitterness. But somehow I would have it known that because of the black the white has suffered too.

SWEET GREEN SODA AND CAKE

I saw my first Negro on March 26, 1935. He gave me a big bottle of green soda. He was the owner of a poolroom. On my way home from school I entered his poolroom for no particular reason. I just wandered in. I don't think that I was in the habit of just wandering in places at the age of five, but I sure was happy that I did—it was a world of thick smoke and black people with sparkling gold teeth and fat stumpy cigars and derby hats and long light-tan shoes. Everything was so round and black and shiny there, except for the owner. He was a tall thin man. He came up to me and patted me on the head and asked my age, which was all to my good because it just happened to be my fifth birthday. Maybe that's why I went in there, to get something for my birthday. I'll never forget the vast whiteness of his smile when he presented me with my present—a big bottle of delicious green soda.

I don't really think that I exercised his hospitality too much. But my thirst for green soda was insatiable, and it was always a green soda he gave me. I loved the place. I both loved it and feared it. Loved it because of the soda which I got free and because of the kindness I was given, for doing nothing, just entering and standing there. And feared it because something in me felt a difference.

Not many years later, in another neighborhood, another black angel—he was the janitor of an apartment building on the route that I took to and from Catholic Sunday School. When I'd pass the open window of his basement home I would see a big dish of cakes and a big pile of comics. Every time I passed there I'd see fresh cakes and new comics.

One Sunday, unable to resist temptation any longer, I looked in and saw that the room was empty. I went to the back entrance. The door was not locked. I entered and went straight for the cakes and comics. The sofa I sat on was huge and dusty—it swallowed me up. I must have been on my twentieth comic, about nineteen comics away from the last cake, when he arrived home. I hadn't been scared all the while eating and reading, but now, seeing him there—standing at his door, his face very black, his hair very white, and looking at me with big eyes—my mouth trembled with cake crumbs. Suddenly he smiled a big smile. It told me he wasn't angry. I smiled back. He took off his coat and went to hang it up without saying a word. I got up, said a shaky, "Sorry I ate all your cakes!" and hurried out of there. The next time I passed, there were fresh cakes and a new comic on top of a bigger pile of comics. It was just like Goldilocks and the Three Bears, but I didn't go back for more. Because when I confessed it to the priest that Saturday he mentioned something about poisoned cakes strangers leave about for little crooks.

I CAME BEARING SHADY PINK HOUSES

Somehow I got to be twenty-two years old. And it was in Florida, Fort Lauderdale, that I saw the Negro at his saddest. I was broke, and hungry and homeless, and had gotten myself a job with a building contractor. It was my job to go to Negro homes and convince them to give up their old dilapidated shacks and invest all their savings in a nice brand-new pink house. The building contractor's main salesman would drive me to "niggertown," as he called it, and there leave me to ferret house after house until nightfall when he would pick me up at a proposed time and place.

At first he showed me how to sales-talk. We'd go into a Negro home, usually swarming with kids and mangy dogs and sofas all torn with the stuffing bursting out, and with bare mattresses on the floor, and I'd be sitting with the kids, playing with them probably like no white man ever had, while he'd be talking "nigger-talk"—dumb, square, condescending biblical remarks like: "Old Jericho knew about rotten walls" and such. When we were in the car together he asked me how I could sit on that dirty sofa and play with those dirty kids, that did I really like "niggers"? I remember telling him that I had to be friendly if I expected to make a sale—but what I was really tempted to tell him was that I'd been sleeping under a palm tree for two weeks and was quite dirty myself (I never look dirty even when I am). So I figured right then and there that he must have been a prejudiced man. Because colored people are not easy to discern as dirty or clean for that matter.

So every day from ten in the morning to five at night I went Negro house to Negro house, and they all were nice to me and let me in; I saw the pink house that was being peddled them, and it wasn't bad; it was modern and all that. But it sure didn't seem as if any of them could afford it—I think it went for six thousand dollars. The deal would be that if I got anyone interested, I'd save him for the main salesman, and he, with his pitch, would try to finish the deal. My share was three hundred dollars.

I made one sale. It was to two of the sweetest elderly people. The old man was proud and upright, a hard worker on the railroad all his life, and his wife was all smiles all the time, and their house was quite large and in good condition, and it seemed to fit them, it had a porch and lots of other things the modern pink concrete house didn't have—in fact the modern pink house didn't seem to fit them at all—but they had lots of money saved and just didn't know what to do with it, and I guess it was like buying a brand-new car. Anyway it was my first and last sell. The money went quick. And I ended up (Continued on page 110)

The afternoon was gone. Blaze said it was time for work and she had to stop at a florist's for fresh roses. She called a cab and we waited for it at the end of her long driveway. We might have driven one of her cars, she said, but her Jaguar was in a repair shop and she had loaned her white Cadillac to a friend. She wondered where the hell the friend was—he had promised to return the car days ago. Then she heaved a terrible sigh. She said she had fallen in love again, this time with a man closer to her own age. "Hard as I've worked," she swore, "I'd quit stripping for him." But the romance had faltered; she was sure his friends were talking against her because she was a stripper. "They think there's something wrong with it, I guess," she said. "That's the way it is in my business. You get used, abused, reused, and de-used. I sure hate to get used, but it always winds up that way. Am I a born loser?" ✠

Once I thought I had another sale made; she was an ancient lady, with high shoes, and she smoked a pipe, and she kept on saying how much she'd like to have such a house. She looked exactly like Li'l Abner's mother, but colored. God, she was strange! She'd tell me all about the deacon who was also the undertaker and how he owed her (I forgot for what reason) a huge sum of money and that I was to go to him and see to it that she got her brand-new pink house. I spent days with her and it ended up with the deacon first of all declaring that he was no undertaker, and secondly that the ancient lady was daffy, and lastly, he didn't owe her a damned cent.

On Friday nights, pay night, I was kept out late. And it was a wild Friday night in Negrotown in Fort Lauderdale. Lots of drinking and fighting and knifings and patrol cars. It was then I first saw the white man's inhumanity to the colored man. Two big cops billy-clubbing a poor helpless drunken Negro, blood all over. A terrible sight. I told the salesman that I couldn't make it on Friday nights because most all the homes were crowded with visitors and were festive, that it was no time for a salesman. I think I was just plain scared—mine being the only white face around. But those Negroes of Fort Lauderdale, they were not the Negroes of the Youth House. They were a whipped people.

—They were getting bugged with me at the building contractors because I was doing lousy.

—And I kept borrowing a dollar or more, on account, everyday to eat.

—I was warned that if I didn't do better I'd have to call it quits.

Then indeed a bad piece of luck came to me—without a cent, and no money to pay the week's rent, something right out of Dostoyevsky happened. I knocked on the door of a Negro home and a little girl opened the door and said, "Wait a minute"—and she came back with three ten-dollar bills, saying something about her mother telling her to give the collector man the sum. The poor girl! Who else could I have been but that damned white money-collector?! I thanked her and fled before the real white man came.

That was my farewell to the Negrotown of Fort Lauderdale, to Florida and the South. The money got me a Greyhound bus ticket as far as Pittsburgh. That little girl was a godsend. But I was her devil and to this day I regret the whipping she must have gotten on my account. That was the only time I ever did a Negro wrong.

BEFORE THE BIRD WAS ON THE WING

I knew Charlie Parker, the great jazz innovator, off and on. My first encounter with him was in the Open Door, a wonderful jazz spot in the Old Village days, the early Fifties, not only because of the great music they began there but because of the people who went there: the first and real and great hipsters. And Parker knew this—unlike all the other musicians who "played it cool" which meant being disdainful, indifferent to the atmosphere around you, looking down your nose at the audience—O not Parker. He loved talking with those early hipsters, he knew that they spoke in language what he played in music. I felt right then and there that he had that rare thing in creative people: unity. He was a unified being, not just some swinging jazzman.

I remember on that first occasion going up to him after he finished his set and telling him, "Wouldn't it be great when everybody is jumping and screaming as you blow wilder and wilder that you end up by crashing your horn on the piano BANG CRASH BOOM to climax the song, the set, the whole thing once and for all?" He said, "Great! but horns are many . . . like to really do the thing I should go crash my mouth on the piano, like bust my mouth all up. That would do it."

The next time I met him was in an Italian restaurant in the Village. He remembered me. He asked me what was I doing in the restaurant; I asked him what was he doing in the restaurant. He said he came there because he liked the Italian pickles, so we sat down and he ordered a big plate of pickles. We talked about lots of things: jail, squares, violence and poetry. He gave me a real gentle look when I spoke about poetry, as if to say he liked that I was a poet, and even though the pickles were very sour (which Italian pickles can be), no look of sourness ever came upon his good face during the whole conversation. Usually when I get to feel that a person is with me in heart and in intelligence all the way, I become very honest with them, even if it means saying things that will hurt them. I told him about some of my experiences with the Negroes in jail when I was a kid, and he said something like: "They weren't Negroes, they were kids—you were a kid."

The next time I saw him was about three months before his death. He was playing in some Village nightclub, I forget the name. It was our third meeting. Again he recognized me, only this time he seemed real happy to see me. He seemed to be bugged with the atmosphere of the joint he was playing in. He put his arm around me and said, "Let's take a walk." We walked down the dark, empty Village streets smoking a stick of tea. We got delightfully high speaking about all kinds of madly profound things. We talked about Heisenberg, a German philosopher-scientist, and his wild theory that when you discover something it immediately changes its appearance.

Parker took that to mean that you can never find out the real goods on anything "nohow."

I disagreed with him there—I felt that one could get the real goods on things somehow—else what future was there in poetry for me? But it all depends how one looks at a thing, and with what eyes. He saw with Negro eyes, and I with white. And there is the difference. ✠

THE LONELINESS OF THE MISSILE ATTENDANT

Malmstrom's original student body was drawn from fifty-one schools in thirty-seven states. Nearly a third were graduates of Annapolis, West Point or the Air Force Academy, with naval-academy officers, oddly, predominating in this midcontinental, underground service. The average age of the Missilemen is twenty-seven, with Academy graduates running younger, the former S.A.C. pilots older. Only a third of the Missile Combat Crew officers are fliers. Their common denominator is the baccalaureate degree.

"We pulled them out of the pot," said Colonel Max W. Henney, wing vice commander, "and what you get from a pot is potpourri. We have weathermen, radar men, civil engineers, pilots. We didn't know when we started and we don't know yet what are the components of the ideal missile crewman. We have the specs for an air crew; we've learned what types will fit together best for a flying team. But the situation in a cockpit is altogether different from that in a capsule. There is no direct confrontation underground."

Henney is a rangy moose of a man, so big that in his fighter-pilot days a ground crew member once said to him, "You don't get into that P-39, sir, you put it on." In recent years his assignments have indicated that the Air Force considers him an excellent innovator, a man with a flair for solving unusual problems.

"We've had an image of the air officer, an image with a streak of the romantic to it," Henney mused. "He was expected to have a touch of 'Kick the tire, light the fire, first in the air is leader.' But that's hardly what is needed for duty here. We're not looking for some wild-ass who wants to be doing slow rolls at Mach 2. It may be that what we want are older, more experienced men.

"We don't know all the qualities we seek, but certainly a key one is a sense of responsibility." Henney paused and shook his head. "Responsibility is not the precise word," he said. Someone took a Roget's Thesaurus from the colonel's desk, thumbed it, and suggested, "Motivation? Intelligence? Maturity? Stability?" Henney frowned at each suggestion. "Maybe there isn't just one word," he said.

"Being chosen for missile-crew duty means being chosen to sit for long periods of time in a capsule, doing rather menial chores, pushing buttons at the proper time, reporting the status of what is happening to the missiles in their sites.

"The combat crew lives in an artificial environment—strict, tight, closely controlled. They face rigorous examinations regularly on which they have to make perfect scores, and yet the tests are not really challenging, just demanding.

"Some of the men can't do it. A few have simply resigned their commissions and left the Air Force. There is an element of truth to the complaint some make that they are just Glorified Switchboard Operators.

"Yet peeking over the shoulder of every man here, and every man in every launch-control center, is the awesome, sobering, terrible sense of knowing that he is directly, unequivocably responsible for a very significant part of the overall national defense plan.

"In the history of warfare, in the history of the world, no junior officers have ever before been called on to take such responsibility." ✠

What Now?—One Negro Leader's Answer

Observance of a 'moratorium' on actions that may bring violence, he argues, is essential to forestall the growth of a white reaction—at the polls.

By ROY WILKINS

THERE can be absolutely no understanding of the recent rioting in Northern Negro ghettos, or any realistic analysis of its impact upon the civil-rights movement and the nation, without the primary realization that Negro citizens have just, pressing and long-neglected grievances. We do not erupt simply for exercise. We do not curse imaginary obstacles, practices and procedures. Our resentments are not the product of a momentary flare-up, but of years of postponement, insult and denial.

We are told to prepare, but we see half-prepared whites getting ahead. We are told to learn, but our children are carefully, technically and administratively shunted to certain schools. We are told to be diligent on the job, but we are denied promotion.

We are urged to be upstanding, proud, cleanly, orderly and decent home-owning citizens, but we are shut out—except for a courageous or fortunate few—from all homes except those in the slums. A white prostitute, dope handler, jewel thief, procurer, gambling lord, confidence man or call-house madam can buy or rent a home or an apartment anywhere, but not a law-abiding, God-fearing Negro family.

So, for jobs, for schools, for housing and for a chance to enjoy the rudimentary Americanisms, the Negro explodes now and then, not only because all roads seems to be blocked, but because a club or gun is brandished to reinforce the existing barricades. Therefore, a bow must be made to the bitter assertion by the proponents of the Negro "strike-back" philosophy that only when Negroes "break loose" does the majority community act to meet Negro grievances.

Yet basically, and always, there stands the incontrovertible fact that the Negro population, nationwide, is a 10 per cent minority; economically and politically the race exerts far less influence than even this 10 per cent figure would seem to warrant. Negroes simply do not have the economic, political or physical power to achieve their goals against an entrenched and powerful 90 per cent majority.

IN light of these hard facts, the prime, continuing racial policy looking toward eradication of inequities must be one of winning friends and influencing people among the white majority. The policy would have to be the same if the majority were Chinese or East Indian or Malaysian.

Riotous action, resulting in deaths, injuries, property destruction and looting, does not persuade a majority toward any but the barest and most reluctant concessions — the minimum required to halt depredation. More often than not, despite sober advice to the contrary, it moves authorities to the employment of repression and rigid control.

Resort to such tactics hurts the nation, especially a nation attempting to exemplify the egalitarian society. Our country is hurt far more in 1964 than it would have been in 1924 because the world struggle between controlled and free societies is now in a crucial phase.

In 1955-56 the nation received the first dramatic notice of peaceful, nonviolent protest demonstrations. The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. led the Montgomery bus boycott and forced the world to focus on the Negro's condition in the American South. All King demonstrations since then have been under the banner of nonviolence. Even in the prolonged Birmingham, Ala., upheaval of 1963, looting occurred on only one occasion.

suasive upon the national conscience, especially so in race relations where the merest schoolboy knows the Negro has been grievously mistreated. It exhibits a courage in the face of psychological and physical threats, a willingness to suffer to attain a goal. It is not arrogant. It is peaceful and resolutely righteous. It is a moral and spiritual crusade as disturbingly relentless in its quiet pressure as any bomb or brick.

BECAUSE of the King pattern and of the traditional nonviolent philosophy of the N.A.A.C.P., the disruptive, yet still nonviolent, demonstrations on New York City's Triborough Bridge and at the opening of the New York World's Fair alarmed the city and the nation. The projected "stall-in" of automobiles to block access to the fair and to create a monster traffic tie-up fizzled in April. Yet it was argued by its sponsors, as it is by the overt and subtle inciters to violence, that only through such distasteful, shocking, unorthodox and disruptive tactics can the majority be made to realize the plight of the minority and the depth of feeling over that plight.

"These motorists," said a demonstrator, "are delayed maybe 20 minutes on their trips, but we have been delayed for years and years in rat-infested tenements!"

This is true, and it sounds wonderful to a crowd of aroused sufferers. The flaw is that the overwhelming majority of the inconvenienced ones, like the potential victims of the fair stall-in, have little or no power to do anything about tenements or about jobs in the building-trades unions. The further and more damaging flaw is that this tactic is likely to antagonize not only the man caught in the squeeze, but a substantial section of the public that resents the shotgun technique.

Whether violence grows out of an honestly spontaneous eruption of emotion or whether it is drummed into life by incantation or other incitement, it does little good, either as a catharsis or as a corrective for social ills. It brings on looting and grand thievery, thus branding both the general society, whose exclusions and denials nurtured this method of protest, and many members of the minority group, who helplessly shrug it off.

All the "hard" talk to the contrary, the Negro as a group is nonviolent in the pursuit of civil rights. He follows nonviolent leadership, either Dr. King's "pure," love-your-enemy variety, or the tactically diluted N.A.A.C.P. brand, or the tightrope - walking kind of CORE and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

Of late years Malcolm X and others have sought to give a cult halo to blackness in much the same manner that the Kipling-Klan school tried to give a halo to whiteness. There is no quarrel with the effort to teach pride in blackness and this had been preached long before the emergence of Malcolm; there is, however, a quarrel with the force-feeding of racism under the cloak of race pride.

RACISM, black or white, and regardless of the monuments it may rear up temporarily, is not the answer to the yearnings of the plain people of the world. With it we may have panoply, pronouncements and power of an uneasy sort, but we are sure to have, also, suspicion, intrigue, hatred and conflict.

The leadership that recognizes the American Negro as an American who has been on this continent for 345 years and must, therefore, attain his heritage as an American is the leadership in tune with reality. As uncertain and despairing as that reality may seem at times under the ministrations of the majority and the interpretations of the black prophets of gloom and desperation, it is nevertheless the only feasible way now discernible.

The 210,000 Negro and white Americans who marched to Washington last Aug. 28 were petitioning their government to be admitted into, not to be excluded from, American democracy. This was the emphatic answer to the racial separatists, black and white.

The ministers of the racial-pride appeal (Malcolm X and sundry other black nationalists together with some white segregationists) commit the common error of equating the desire for equality with the desire to be white. One can be fiercely proud of being black and still demand equality in the world of men, whatever their color. In fact, the demand for equality is in reality the truest expression of racial pride. The determination to require for one's race the same treatment accorded other races, is the determination of a people too proud to accept discrimination.

THE course for the Negro is clear: He cannot abandon at this stage, even if he wished to do so, his march toward equal nondiscriminatory citizenship. There would be nowhere for him to go; the Asians have Asia and the Africans nearly all of Africa. North America must be for North Americans, whatever their racial origins.

The American Negro must press his case intelligently and persistently, remaining flexible enough in method and in weapons to exploit every opening, expand every gain. Neither in the North or in the South can he risk being wedded to one approach; demonstrations have a function, but a limited one, in the far-flung contest for dignity and opportunity for a whole race.

In the South, the struggle in many areas is still for the basic rights taken for granted by all whites and enjoyed for decades by many Negroes outside the South. In Mississippi, the goal is still freedom to register and vote. In the South, a still-vast segregated and inferior public- school system exists, despite court rulings and token compliance. Here the Negro must use court action, moral suasion, consumer buying influence, his slowly-growing voting strength, and nonviolent demonstrations.

WHILE opposition in the South is more openly declared, more emotionally incited and more crudely executed, increasing numbers of Southern white people are recognizing in one fashion or another that change is inevitable. One could hazard the guess that eventually the South will make greater substantive, as well as relative, strides toward equality than the North.

In the North, Negroes have a weapon which too many of them have neglected to use effectively: the ballot. They know about it and they use it, but not as effectively as the Irish, the Poles, the Italians and the Jews have used it. Negroes, as Gunnar Myrdal points out in "An American Dilemma," have not got out of politics what other minorities have managed to get.

The Negro has today the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the result of a long, dedicated, persistent and skillful effort over the past 40 years. He has this legislative affirmation of his citizenship rights as a result of bipartisan votes in both houses and a powerful assist from a President born in Texas.

But he could have had such an act years ago if he had registered and voted to his full potential in the non-Southern states. The ballot is no cure-all, but it is a tool in a democratic society that no group, disadvantaged socially and economically, can afford to ignore.

Southern white society, flat on its back after the Civil War, made a holy profession of politics. It acquired its detailed knowledge of every political stratagem, every rule, procedure and pressure and then schemed and fought its way to such a balance of power that its racial policy was forced upon the nation for 100 years.

THOSE Northern Negroes who sneer at the ballot box in favor of ego-satisfying (and too often ephemeral) "direct action" are overlooking a potent weapon. Negroes also have a barely scratched potential in directed consumer buying campaigns. This is a legitimate weapon for a minority, made up largely of consumers, to employ to secure employment and promotion opportunities. Of course, continued use will have to be made of litigation, legislation, persuasion and nonviolent demonstrations.

Violence, however, has to be ruled out as a tactic. The tongue-in-cheek apologists for it must be suspect. Repeated recitation of grievances, coupled with predictions of violence as "the only alternative," or predictions that "hell will break loose," even when these are true, are strong suggestions, if not open invitations, to eruption. Police intimidation in the form of iron-fisted suppression under the excuse of preserving "law and order" also adds fuel to the smoldering fire.

It is hard to imagine a period in our recent history when racial-protest demonstrations, with their always possible violent incidents, could have a more damaging role in the Negro's — and the nation's—affairs. It seems clear that the three outbreaks in New York State and the one in New Jersey have hurt the Negro's cause and that more of the same will injure it still further.

THE Civil Rights Act has just been enacted and every indication is that with intelligent and persistent effort its implementation can be carried forward on a wide scale. It is the most comprehensive act of its kind ever made law and will bring new benefits to millions of Negro citizens and will ratify the benefits now enjoyed by other millions.

But one of the six Republican Senators (out of 33) who voted against the civil rights bill, Senator Goldwater, has been nominated for the Presidency. His party's platform omits any pledge of the use of Federal powers to protect civil rights, although reference is made to enforcement of the Civil Rights Act.

This Republican convention had fewer Negro delegates than any since the enfranchisement of the Negro, with none from four Southern states where the Goldwater faction has taken over the party machinery. Senator Goldwater's acceptance speech justified extremism for the purpose of installing ultraconservative government, the kind he calls "constitutional."

Pointedly, the Senator declared, "There is violence in our streets . . . ," just as an earlier convention speaker referred to criminals with "switchblade knives." No mention was made of violence and death on the back roads of Mississippi.

AFTER the convention, Senator Goldwater, already supported by the John Birch Society, was endorsed by the Georgia Ku Klux Klan, but the Senator rejected the K. K. K. support Aug. 6 despite the prior acceptance of it by Dean Burch, the new national chairman, and William E. Miller, the Vice Presidential candidate. Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, while withdrawing from the Presidential race, has given his approval to the Goldwater program.

Since the convention, also, the Goldwater forces have played upon the fear of white Americans that racial violence will be rampant. Deceitfully, they charge that the present Administration has not intervened promptly and effectively in the recent riots, even though their own states' rights platform stands flatly against any such intervention.

Thus, they are bringing racism into the campaign on the lowest level—that of physical fear.

Such a foe, unashamed and unmasked, would seem to call for every possible counterstep by those whose basic rights are threatened. This involves the temporary and voluntary giving up of tactics that foment hostility while the challenge of the chief menace to the freedom of all Americans is dealt with.

THE vast majority of Negro citizens sees this clearly and has responded to the "moratorium" appeal of some national leaders issued July 29. But some organized groups and some individual civil-rights entrepreneurs are hesitant or openly hostile to a moratorium. For most of these, demonstrations are their only stock in trade. They rarely admit this. They cry "capitulation," "sell-out to the Democrats," "Only demonstrations get attention," "We can't be guided by the alarms of white people," and, most far-fetched, "There can be no moratorium on constitutional rights."

Yet each one of these groups and individuals would be summarily suppressed under the kind of fanaticism a Goldwater regime could bring about. And each would help to bring the fanatics to power if it held street demonstrations culminating in violence, for these would validate the fears harped on by the Goldwater campaigners.

IN this crisis, where steps must be taken to avert a national disaster, the menace is a creed, a cult, bordering on hysteria in millions of its adherents, organized into a dedicated political machine, directed with calculated precision and financed with plentiful funds. This menace is not only pledged to ignore Negro political and economic demands and to allow the Mississippi type of apartheid to proceed unchecked, but to suppress by force all pro-civil-rights demonstrations.

Nothing could be more important at the moment in the Negro civil - rights struggle than refraining from any action that aids Goldwaterism. The response to the moratorium plea will be the measure of the maturity of the Negro community. No sacrifice of principle is involved, only an alteration — temporarily — in tactics. Those Negroes who mistake tactics for principles are miscast in the struggle for the race's freedom.

Never before has the Negro been placed directly in such a key role in the struggle to preserve the nation's tradition of freedom for the individual. What rides here is democracy for white and black alike, for Northerner and Southerner, for rich and for poor.

Responsible Negro leadership has recognized the peril to its people and to the country and has made a recommendation to its own followers. Leadership in the white community must be responsible. It must make prompt, effective and meaningful efforts, on more than a token scale, to redress old and festering conditions.

For the best answer to Goldwaterism is a democracy in which all the people have a stake of such size and value that no blitzkrieg will be able to take over a free land and a free people.

Analysis of the 'White Backlash'

As manifested in one city of the North, reaction to the demands of Negroes for full citizenship runs deep and takes some unexpected forms.

By WILLIAM LEE MILLER

WHEREVER there are large groups of white citizens of immigrant extraction, one argument against the civil rights movement (or rather, against its moving "too fast") recurs incessantly: "Nobody helped us." "We Italians had to work our own way up — why can't they?" A workingman of Irish background said to me, after New Haven adopted a strong city equal opportunities bill: "Equal opportunities, eh? They didn't have that when I was startin' out."

In New Haven's recent struggles over discrimination in jobs and housing and — especially — "racial imbalance" in the schools, this one argument must have been used, by conservative estimate, 87,000 times. I have come to think of one version of it as the Comparative Grandfathers theme: it begins: "Now, when my grandfather came over from the old country . . ." and it ends with some form of the idea that this most recent wave of immigrants — the Negro from the South — is receiving a special help that an earlier "my grandfather" wave —Italian, Jewish, Irish, Polish—did not receive. This argument is so pervasive and spontaneous as to represent an unmistakable reality of popular feeling; it is, of course, one major theme in the so-called "white backlash;" it doubtless lay behind the President's insistence, when he signed the Civil Rights Act, that it gives no special favors but only assures equality and it helps to give emotional force to the idea of "inverse discrimination" that is condemned in the Goldwater Republican platform.

HAVING argued against it, as an alderman in New Haven, I want to make two points: first, it is wrong; but second, it is understandable. It is not necessarily morally reprehensible. Not everybody who advances it is a racist—not by a long shot. I think that some of the "backlash" deserves more empathy and understanding than militant civil-rights leaders are sometimes willing to grant (understandably of course, on their part, too).

I don't mean that the "nobody helped us" ethnic analogy is a legitimate argument against the civil-rights movement. Of course it is not. As one tries to say to that Irish workingman, who said he hadn't had "equal opportunities": the Irishman can lose his brogue but the Negro can't change his color; the Irishman can move up and out (a great-grandson becoming President) but the Negro is blocked by multiple rings of discrimination; and as to the game of Comparative Grandfathers (whose had it worse?) the Negro always wins that: his grandfather was a slave. He was forcibly brought here, bought and sold; his children never had a start. And, as one does not say in that argument, there is something more lurking in the background that any reference to intermarriage and sex relations would quickly make clear: there is still a terrible life-blighting, humiliating notion of the Negro as a fundamentally different kind of being — in short, of race.

The Negro has been blocked by reinforcing rings of racial discrimination, in housing, employment, education, health and public accommodations, and then stereotyped by the prejudice that discrimination helps to reinforce. This in turn causes more discrimination — in a brutal circular social pattern that goes far beyond what any white ethnic groups experienced. Even if it were not so, "two wrongs do not make a right." But because it is built on the visible fact of racial appearance, and grows out of slavery and is structured into the society in cruel stereotypes and patterns of unequal racial treatment, the "wrong" to the Negro is qualitatively worse than that meted out to the European immigrant, bad as the latter often was.

ANYONE who has been in the college or liberal or church circles in which "race relations" has been the number one "social problem" for at least 20 years, could give these answers easily. And such a person may be exasperated — having heard it so many times himself—to discover people who don't get it. But there are plenty of Northern whites who have not been raised on "The Races of Mankind," Gunnar Myrdal and the "vicious circle" theory, and for whom the problem of the Negro, requiring civil-rights acts, open occupancy laws, school redistricting and "busing," is not all that obvious.

That "vicious circle" theory after all, is not as easy for the ordinary white man to grasp as civil-rights lecturers sometimes assume; in worlds in which a strong civil-rights position is not an accepted social convention, it takes either an extraordinary compassion, or else a certain ability to deal with abstractions, to grasp it. One must be able to picture how a complicated social and psychological pattern works, to produce the conditions one observes in Negro neighborhoods. That takes some learning; to reverse the meaning of the too often quoted song from "South Pacific," "You have to be carefully taught."

AT one point in New Haven's heated hearings on proposals to end "racial imbalance" in the schools the militant young leader of the local CORE ("We DEMAND, yes, DEMAND . . .") said that bringing white kids into the Negro "ghetto" schools would have the added benefit of "showing the whites how Negroes live." Well, unfortunately, even if a school plan were adopted with this rather far-reaching intention, it might not have the desired results. For children from homes that are secure, intelligent, and compassionate, (Continued on Page 87)

SCHOOLING AND JOBS represent two chief points of resistance to the civil-rights movement, especially among new members of the middle class and descendants of immigrants. They argue: "Equal opportunities? We didn't have that when I was starting out."

knowing more about how impoverished Negroes really live could increase sympathy or liberalism or guilt or determination to "do something."

But what about the others? A fair-minded man of Irish background, for one very common example, tried earnestly to persuade me that my support for strong civil-rights laws was wrong, exactly by citing examples of conditions that he had encountered in making his calls in slum Negro neighborhoods. He knew "how Negroes live" — and that was the main reason he opposed these civil-rights laws.

A CIVIL-RIGHTS advocate may explode at this, and say that such a man is obviously a "bigot" and not "fair-minded" if he blames the conditions of poverty-stricken people, without a chance or a hope, on race. I quite agree that slum conditions do not come from race but from poverty and hopelessness, and that the mass of Negroes have been forced to be poor and hopeless, and that it is doubly galling and unjust to have racial stereotypes built on conditions thus forcibly created by racial discrimination. I would suggest only that the ordinary white workingman is not necessarily morally reprehensible for not having figured all that out. All we can say about him is that he is lacking in compassionate social imagination—but then, aren't we all?

The "backlasher" feels that it is he, and not the well-fixed white civil-rights advocate, who must bear the disadvantages of the correction of this national injustice to the Negro —an injustice that he does not, himself, perceive too clearly, partly because a threat to him personally interferes with his perception. "You don't think it's right for a Negro to take Sam's job, do you, Bill?" The great point is that he feels directly caught and involved. His feeling may in many cases be groundless or exaggerated, projected out of fear or prejudice far beyond the fact but still there often is a kernel of truth in it.

The sad and terrible fact, that Negroes en masse are linked to ills of poverty, should be the occasion for extraordinary efforts to break that link; for many an ordinary struggling white man, however (no ideologue or hero, he), that fact is rather the basis of a not altogether unrealistic personal fear. If schools are to be "racially balanced," for example, some white kids will have to be sent to the Negro "ghetto" schools. Whose will they be? Quite possibly his. The opponents said that the New Haven school proposals would take their children away from the neighborhood school and abruptly send them to a different and (at least they think) worse school in a (they certainly do think) worse part of town, away from the school, perhaps, that was the reason for buying a house in a particular district. When they are given general lectures in race relations, they turn with some ferocity on the proposal's white proponents.

THIS antagonism could be seen with clarity during the hearings on school proposals this June in New Haven. The city has, along with its very thin remaining layer of old "Yankees," a large slice of Enlightenment; we have a progressive city administration and a remarkable urban renewal program, full of able administrators, and a notable Ford - Foundation - sponsored "human renewal" program, full of social workers; we have an enlightened school board and, of course, one of the world's great universities, presumably dispensing Lux and Veritas.

At the same time New Haven has an even larger slice of citizens of relatively recent immigrant background; it is sometimes said to have the largest proportionate population of Italian extraction of any city in the country. And many of the latter struck back angrily.

To put the general point rudely, it seemed that well-fixed private-school liberals, with good jobs and big houses in lily-white suburbs or in fancy parts of town, are bravely summoning the public-school workingmen on two-family-house streets, please to face the moral crisis of our time. One woman in New Haven told the old joke about the pig's comment to the chicken on the subject of the ham-and-eggs breakfast: "For you, it is a contribution; for me, it is a sacrifice."

This attack is, of course, in many individual cases quite inaccurate and unfair; it was difficult for wrought-up opponents of the school proposals, for example, to admit that there really were those — all honor to them — whose own children were immediately involved but who were nevertheless supporting the proposals. In group terms, however, the opponents' angry attack has a kind of rough and primitive justice in it. The Yale and college-educated liberal communities do have, broadly speaking, a privileged sanctuary, and often seem to see only the disabilities of the Negro; the ethnic backlash people, on the other hand, see a series of groups — Irish, Polish, Jewish, Italian — in which the Negro is yet another one, now on the bottom, to whom should apply the same counsels and possibilities as applied to the others: group solidarity and mutual help, upward mobility through hard work and education.

"There are plenty of Negroes who have made something of themselves," an Italian lady said to me, all innocence at the fallacies implied in her use of this true statement; and again and again reference was made to having "them" make "their own schools" better, as an alternative to correcting racial imbalance. The error in this point-of-view is large, but it is not surprising that the view should be held.

One of the ways the error can be indicated is by reference to the different effects of the passage of time on the different ethnic groups; for the white groups, the generations more or less steadily advanced; for the Negro, however, blocked by discrimination, while automation eliminates jobs, the situation may become steadily worse. But to grasp that fact, and to see why it is true, and to see why it is not the "fault" of the group in question, requires ability to deal with abstract social ideas and/or extraordinary compassion and/or personal economic security.

Much depends, of course, on what you are expected to believe in your circle (most of us don't think these things out from scratch by ourselves). In many Northern college-educated and "sophisticated" circles, at least a kind of superficial antiracism is the norm, but this may not be true in the world of most urban ethnic groups.

Even in the one group of which it is true — the Jewish community — there may be difficulties among those personally involved.

The Jewish community has a liberal ethos on "intergroup relations" that the other white ethnic groups, by and large, do not; at the same time, however, it also has a deep and passionate devotion to education, going well beyond that, by and large, of the others. The original New Haven school proposals brought these two themes, in a predominately Jewish section, into a sharp emotional and really rather poignant conflict.

I DO not conclude that there should be any less strong action for civil rights. On the contrary, these thoughts reinforce one of the secondary reasons for a rapid breaking down of discrimination — so that the average white man, who has his own difficulties, knows Negroes from his school and boys' club, and even more so that the mass of Negroes he encounters (from which encounter, rather than from race - relations lectures, he learns his lesson) is not identical with the urban proletariat; so that the Negro does not appear to be ineluctably linked to the ills of poverty, and an ethnic group that hasn't, as the others have, "lifted itself;" so that there are more and more middle and upper-class, white-collar business and professional Negroes around to break stereotypes (that is a secondary reason, obviously; the primary reason is the justice of equal opportunities in its own right).

But at the same time I think we should be wary of a single-minded concentration on civil rights that is inattentive to the broad social setting, and separated from measures of general economic and social improvement. We should avoid, I think, the attitude that absolutely separates problems of race from problems of class, and that is highly moralistic about race but conservative or uninterested about social and economic welfare.

DIRECT coercive governmental action to break racial discrimination is, of course, inescapably necessary, but unless it is set in the frame of generally improving conditions in employment and housing and education it will certainly become explosive and it may even some day become unfair.

It makes me uneasy to notice that, on the national scene, while civil rights has a tremendous head of steam, Federal aid to education (money for urban schools) and even the antipoverty program have nothing comparable.

I think we should be very cautious about the moral disapproval, and sometimes even the social disdain, with which this issue is filled: "It's quite clear cut," a cultivated type may say, after one of the heated meetings; "it's the responsible people against the rednecks." A sweet, well-fixed liberal wife may be made "positively ill" by the speeches against the school proposals, which "are so illiterate." There may be an element of contempt in the picture of the ethnic backlasher—true enough, perhaps, in its way, but it is important in what tone of voice it is said — that these are "people who have just made it themselves and are insecure."

And as to the repeated insistence that the whole thing is a "moral issue," that's true enough, too, but it doesn't mean that the full "moral" conviction that attaches to racial equality attaches also to every particular civil-rights move. It certainly doesn't mean that all of us who favor strong civil-rights action are thereby morally superior to all those who resist. It depends upon what our own alternatives are, and in the working out of this thing we will need more of Lincoln than of reconstructionist righteousness.

Parties Stake Out Policies

How the Platforms Compare on Key Points

◆ With the publication of the Democratic Party platform last week, the public could compare that document with the platform issued by the Republicans in San Francisco. The excerpts that follow show how each party stands on the most prominent issues.

Policy for Peace

Democrats: Peace should be the first concern of all governments as it is the prayer of all men.

At the start of the third decade of the nuclear age, the preservation of peace requires the strength to wage war and the wisdom to avoid it.

Control of the use of nuclear weapons must remain solely with the highest elected official in the country—the President of the United States.

The complications and dangers in our restless, constantly changing world require of us consummate understanding and experience. One rash act, one thoughtless decision, one unchecked reaction—and cities could become smoldering ruins and farms parched wastelands.

Republicans: Our nation's leadership must be judged—indeed, American independence and survival are dependent on—the stand it takes toward communism. That stand must be: Victory for freedom. There can be no peace, there can be no security, until this goal is won.

A dynamic strategy aimed at victory . . . reduces the risk of nuclear war. It is a nation's vacillation, not firmness, that tempts an aggressor into war.

Republicans will make clear to all Communists now supporting or planning to support guerrilla and subversive activities, that henceforth there will be no privileged sanctuaries to protect those who disrupt the peace of the world.

We will take the Cold War offensive on all fronts. . . .

Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty

Democrats: In the nuclear test-ban treaty, signed now by over 100 nations, we have written our commitments to limitations on the arms race, consistent with our security. We are determined to continue all-out efforts through fully enforceable measures to halt and reverse the arms race and bring to an end the era of nuclear terror.

Republicans: We will fully implement such safeguards as our security requires under the limited nuclear test-ban treaty. We will conduct advanced tests in permissible areas, maintain facilities to test elsewhere in case of violations, and develop to the fullest our ability to detect Communist transgressions. We shall also provide sensible, continuing reviews of the treaty itself.

We will demand that any arms-reduction plan worthy of consideration guarantee reliable inspection.

Vietnam and Berlin

Democrats: We pledge unflagging devotion to our commitments to freedom from Berlin to South Vietnam.

We will oppose aggression and the use of force or the threat of force against any nation.

Republicans: We will move decisively to assure victory in South Vietnam.

We will demand that the Berlin Wall be taken down prior to the resumption of any negotiations with the Soviet Union on the status of forces in, or treaties affecting, Germany.

Cuba

Democrats: We will move actively to carry out the resolution of the Organization of American States to further isolate Castroism and speed the restoration of freedom and responsibility in Cuba.

Republicans: We Republicans will recognize a Cuban government in exile; we will support its efforts to regain the independence of its homeland; we will assist Cuban freedom fighters in carrying on guerrilla warfare against the Communist regime.

Captive Nations

Democrats: We will encourage by all peaceful means the growing independence of the captive peoples living under communism and hasten the day that . . . (they) will achieve full freedom and self-determination.

Republicans: Republicans reaffirm their longstanding commitment to a course leading to eventual liberation of the Communist-dominated nations of Eastern Europe, Asia, and Latin America.

The Atlantic Alliance

Democrats: In every possible way we will work to strengthen our ties and increase our co-operation, building always more firmly on the sure foundation of the NATO treaty.

Republicans: Republicans regard NATO as indispensable for the prevention of war and the protection of freedom. It is a keystone of Republican foreign policy to revitalize the Alliance.

United Nations

Democrats: We will maintain our solemn commitment to the United Nations, with its constituent agencies, working to strengthen it as a more effective instrument for peace, for preventing or resolving international disputes, and for building free nations through economic, technical, and cultural development.

Republicans: Republicans support the United Nations. However, we will never rest in our efforts to revitalize its original purpose. We will press for a change in the method of voting in the General Assembly and in the specialized agencies that will reflect population disparities among the member states and recognize differing abilities and willingness to meet the obligations of the charter. We urge the calling of an amending convention of the United Nations by the year 1967.

Federal Spending

Democrats: Every penny of Federal spending must be accounted for in terms of the strictest economy, efficiency, and integrity. We pledge to continue a frugal Government, getting a dollar's value for a dollar spent, and a Government worthy of our citizens' confidence. Our goal is a balanced budget in a balanced economy.

Republicans: We pledge a reduction of not less than $5 billion in the present level of Federal spending; an end to chronic deficit financing, proudly reaffirming our belief in a balanced budget; further reduction in individual and corporate tax rates as fiscal discipline is restored; repayments on the public debt.

Reapportionment

Democrats: No plank.

Republicans: We pledge support of a Constitutional amendment, as well as legislation, enabling states having bicameral legislatures to apportion one house on bases of their choosing, including factors other than population.

Extremism

Democrats: We condemn extremism, whether from the right or left, including the extreme tactics of such organizations as the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan, and the John Birch Society.

Republicans: No plank.

Medical Care

Democrats: We will continue to fight until we have succeeded in including hospital care for older Americans in the Social Security program and have insured adequate assistance to those elderly people suffering from mental illness and mental retardation.

Republicans: We pledge full coverage of all medical and hospital costs for the needy elderly people, financed by general revenues through broader implementation of Federal-state plans, rather than the compulsory Democratic scheme covering only a small percentage of such costs for everyone regardless of need.

Social Security

Democrats: The Social Security program . . . contributes greatly to the strength of the nation. We must insure that those who have contributed to the system shall share in the steady increase in our standard of living by adjusting benefit levels.

Republicans: We pledge a strong, sound system of Social Security, with improved benefits to our people.

War on Poverty

Democrats: We will carry the war on poverty forward as a total war against the causes of human want.

Republicans: We pledge to continue Republican sponsorship of practical Federal-state-local programs which will effectively treat the needs of the poor, while resisting direct Federal hand-outs that erode away individual self-reliance and self-respect and perpetuate dependency.

Civil Rights

Democrats: The Civil Rights Act of 1964 deserves and requires full observance by every American and fair, effective enforcement if there is any default.

Republicans: We pledge full implementation and faithful execution of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and all other civil-rights statutes, to assure equal rights and opportunities guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen.

that lawyers have much to answer for. Scheduled for passage by the House of Delegates this week at the association's annual convention in Manhattan is a stern new canon of ethics:

"It is the duty of a lawyer engaged either in the prosecution or the defense of a person accused of a crime to refrain from any action which might interfere with the right of either the accused or the prosecuting governmental entity to a fair trial. To that end it is improper and professionally reprehensible for a lawyer so engaged to express to the public or in any manner extrajudicially any opinion or prediction as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, the weight of the evidence against him or the likelihood that he will be either convicted or acquitted."

Reward from a Robbery Rap

In what may be the year's prize legal oddment, a canny convicted robber has just used Britain's stern libel laws to win a $45,000 judgment against no less a personage than the detective who sent him to jail eleven years ago.

Alfred George Hinds, universally known as Alfie, was convicted of a $100,000 safecracking job in 1953, after being arrested by Herbert Sparks, former chief superintendent of Scotland Yard's ace flying squad. Passionately attached to liberty, Alfie tried to shorten his twelve-year sentence by escaping from jail three times, lost 13 appeals to the highest courts in the land. All this moved Sleuth Sparks, when he retired in 1962, to write a series of articles in the London Sunday Pictorial poohpoohing Alfie's claims of innocence.

Alfie sued Sparks for libel—in effect demanding that Sparks prove that the original conviction was correct. Sparks tried, but a London jury was unconvinced. It found in Alfie's favor—thus casting Alfie's robbery rap in doubt. "Now," he says happily, "I shall press for my conviction to be quashed."

P.A. REUTERS

HINDS & WIFE
A rare legal puzzle.

At first glance, Alfie seems to be asking too much. The doctrine of res judicata (the thing is decided) holds that a fully adjudicated conviction is final. But that doctrine applies only to the original parties—in Alfie's robbery case, that means the Crown v. Hinds. The libel suit involved different parties: Hinds v. Sparks, and only by coincidence was the robbery the key issue. Since it was the issue, however, Alfie managed to have himself found "innocent" in what laymen at least could view as a retrial. Whether he now deserves a pardon is up to Home Secretary Henry Brooke, who has a rare legal puzzle to solve.

COURTS

The Law's Delay

The biggest traffic jam in U.S. courts comes from personal-injury cases, usually growing out of automobile accidents. Such cases now take an average 17.6 months to reach jury trial in the nation's principal courts of general jurisdiction,* reports New York University's Institute of Judicial Administration. Although this year's delay is less than last year's (18.7 months), and is actually down to two months in Spokane, Wash., things still look grim in the heavily populated urban areas that handle most of the cases. The country's 13 slowest jurisdictions:

Cook County (Chicago), Ill.	57.6 months

CIVIL RIGHTS

Hoss Unhorsed

In St. Augustine, Fla., most of the previously white-only motels and restaurants began serving Negroes as soon as the Civil Rights Act became law. The owners wanted peace; racial violence already had cut the tourist trade by 50%. Yet a few days later, most places were resegregated. An army of white racists, the owners said, had forced them to lock out Negroes once more on pain of assault or worse.

In a precedent-setting case under the new law, St. Augustine Negroes asked U.S. District Judge Bryan Simpson in Jacksonville to order compliance by 15 motels and restaurants in their city. Going to the key issue of enforcement, the plaintiffs sought an injunction against the owners' alleged coercers—a troop of white toughs headed by Holsted ("Hoss") Manucy, a convicted moonshiner of Majorcan descent. Manucy, who runs something called the Ancient City Hunting Club, denies membership in the Ku Klux Klan but calls it "a wonderful organization."

At the trial last week, Judge Simpson let the motel and restaurant owners convict Manucy & Co. The owners told of being picketed by whites carrying such intimidating signs as "Niggers Eat Here. Would You?" Many reported anonymous phone calls: "You're not gonna make it home if you keep serving them." Eddy Mussallem of the Caravan Motel said he called everybody from the sheriff to the state police, only to be told that the pickets were doing nothing illegal. With unwitting irony, Tom Xynidis of the Sea Fair Restaurant told Judge Simpson that he was afraid of obeying the law on his own: "If I'm the only one, how can I face my fellow citizens with pride?"

Ordered to take the stand, Hoss Manucy parried one question after another with the same evasive words: "I'm not gonna answer that at this time." Manucy refused to admit not only that he had ever threatened anyone, but also that he even knew his own sons, five of them being his co-defendants. "You don't mean you don't know the people at this time," snapped Judge Simpson, "just that you don't want to answer at this time." Said Manucy meekly: "Yes, Your Honor."

That was enough for Judge Simpson, a Florida aristocrat whose grandfathers fought on both sides in the Civil War. Ordering the restaurant doors opened to Negroes, Simpson enjoined the Manucys and "each member" (about 1,500) of the Ancient City Hunting Club from molesting the owners or Negro customers in any way. James Brock, whose Monson Motor Lodge was set afire, still had a point. For the Civil Rights Act to work in St. Augustine, he testified, "we will need very strong law enforcement for a long time."

Dear Thelma,

In case you haven't heard yet, Jeannie had a boy - 8 lbs. 2 oz. at 6:30 a.m. Saturday, June 1st. He is right plump and very cute. Everyone is happy, and they've named him Kirk Wayne (or Dwayne) Ayers. Jerry & Jeannie have bought a small house in a new subdivision and will have other young couples as neighbors.

Donna graduated Friday night. She now wears size 16 and looks so much better - even has a waist-line! Aleta has lost some weight too.

Dick (Joe's brother) and Barbara are planning to adopt a little girl between now and Christmas.

Just think - I'm a great-aunt and you are a great-grandmother! How about that? Oh, but you already were, with Eddie III and Leigh - I forgot. Our family is really multiplying.

Women Change Minds More --And Are Promoted Less

By HARRY FERGUSON

WASHINGTON (UPI) — It's a woman's privilege to change her mind, and that is precisely the reason why she finds it hard to get ahead in business.

If she is unmarried and planning on a career, she will change her mind fast as soon as the right man asks the right question. If she is married, she will suddenly change her mind and decide to have a baby immediately instead of waiting three years. Every study made of the female work force in the United States brought complaints from employers that women were less stable than men.

The result is that women find it harder to get a job and harder to get promoted when they find one. The National Office Management Association found that one-third of the firms paid women less money than men for equivalent work and experience. A woman bank teller with five years experience, for instance, earned from $5 to $15 a week less than men tellers.

One of the most frequent complaints made by employers is that women have an emotional rather than a rational approach toward their jobs and business in general. Albert E. Schwabacher, an investment banker, finds some women actually fall in love with certain stocks:

"They are likely to develop affectionate feelings toward some of their investments. They often buy or refuse to buy for purely emotional reasons. Affections are properly bestowed upon people, they can perhaps be bestowed upon boats, but they never should be directed toward stocks and bonds."

Other objections to hiring women have been brought out in national surveys:

—Many companies are reluctant to have women supervise departments where men are employed.

—Women have substantially higher rates of absenteeism.

—Few women have the training or knowledge for high-level positions and it is too expensive to give them the needed qualifications.

Apparently employers consider the married woman with children under 18 as the best risk of all. There are 9.7 million of them holding jobs in the United States and their median age is 38. What makes them good employment risks, the U.S. Women's Bureau says is that they need the money: "Many families cannot manage without the mother's earnings."

Those earnings are likely to be small compared with male salaries. About one-third of all earn less than $3,000 a year. Only six per cent of them earn better than $7,000.

An education, of course, helps a woman find work, but it has to be the right kind of education. In their book "Educated American Women," Eli Ginzberg and Alice M. Yohalen quote Miss Noreen Nadler on what happened to her after she received a master's degree from Columbia University:

"I spent the next five months seeking employment, but there were no opportunities to continue teaching in New York. Personnel officers could see no relation between my background in classics and the specialized work they offered.

"My teaching experience (part time) was never considered favorably in any job interview. From the point of view of personnel management, no matter what the job, only the specialist is qualified to fill it . . . liberal training was held in small regard and a background in ancient classics still counts for nothing.

"I finally took a job as an invoice clerk with a large chemical firm in New York at a starting salary of $42 a week. This was the only position offered me after many months of searching. I am still working for the same organization, but I am not employed in electronic data processing after having been given the opportunity to take courses in programming and systems analysis. I earn about $130 a week."

Miss Nadler's point is that she had to educate herself twice in order to work her way up to a substantial salary.

Boards of education seem to think women are suited to teach in the elementary schools, but beyond that there are difficulties. There are some 860,000 women teaching in elementary schools, but when you move up to secondary schools the number drops to 243,000.

The professions are the toughest of all for women workers. Figures compiled by the U.S. Women's Bureau show that the percentage of women is as follows:

Scientists, 8 per cent; physicians, 6 per cent; lawyers, 3 per cent; engineers, 1 per cent.

'NOW' WOMEN'S UNIT, ASKS EQUAL RIGHTS

CHICAGO (UPI) — Full equality for women means, among other things, the right to help pay the rent.

This was the proclamation of NOW, a new organization dedicated to achieving civil rights for women — "to break through the silken curtain of prejudice and discrimination against women."

Betty Friedan, who wrote "The Feminine Mystique," spread NOW's gospel at the organization's first Midwest news conference.

Miss Friedan said that NOW rejected the current assumptions that a man must carry the sole burden of support.

"A true partnership between the sexes demands an equitable sharing of the responsibilities of home and children and the economic burdens of their support," she asserted.

Miss Friedan said there was no civil rights movement to speak for women "as there has been for Negroes and other victims of discrimination."

NOW, she said, has vowed to press for full enforcement of laws prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sex. She called for a nationwide network of child-care centers and "other social innovations" to enable women to work while rearing a family.

U.S. Sex-Bias Law Difficult to Enforce

By ALEXANDER R. HAMMER

Enforcement of a Federal law banning job discrimination because of sex has been difficult and frequently impossible, a Federal civil-rights official said yesterday.

Russell Spector, a lawyer for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, made the statement at a conference here conducted by the Commerce and Industry Association.

The conference focused on the latest developments in enforcing Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, which prohibits discrimination in employment because of sex, as well as on other Federal and state anti-discrimination laws.

Representatives of about 30 companies in New York and New Jersey were present at the discussion as well as state and city civil-rights officials.

Mr. Spector told the meeting that among the major problems

U.S. SEX-BIAS LAW HARD TO ENFORCE

in enforcing Title VII were conflicts with state laws.

He added that the commission had received about 13,000 complaints since the Civil Rights Act went into effect in September, 1965. More than a third of the total pertained to Title VII, he said.

He advised employers to "obey the state law and wait until the court says you're wrong." He added that it may also be to the employers' advantage to seek court determination of the law.

Very few "real situations" have occurred, he noted, except in the modeling and entertainment fields, where the employer' need might dictate a restriction against employing a particular sex.

Most Complainants Women

However, he said, "compliance in the case of restrictive jobs is becoming more flexible and manageable."

Henry Spitz, general counsel for the New York State Commission for Human Rights, said his office had received 214 formal complaints of discrimination because of sex as of April 30. Of that total 165 were filed by women.

He said some employers felt women should not be hired for certain jobs. "I would say that these employers, under the discrimination law, have a difficult time proving this contention."

Thomas D. Sharkey, manager of employment compliance administration of the Olin Mathieson Chemical Corporation, said industry could not invest indefinitely in hiring and training women for jobs, and then lose them when they got married and became pregnant.

New York State and city laws against discrimination and the Federal Civil Rights Act prohibit discrimination in employment because of sex unless based on a bona fide occupational qualification.

RE: CONFERENCE ON AIMS OF CHURCH AND SOCIAL CHANGE
(or something like that) JAN 10 - 13

This conference evolved over a period of eight months. We started talking about it when it was apparent that "black power" was to be the slogan; that the federal government's interest was on the wane; that the day of the grand demonstration was over; that organization was the thing over against just reaction to crisis; and that white, middle class religious types or "liberals" would have to do some re-evaluating.

No person or group was excluded. Keeping the group small was the biggest factor in determining who would come. Present were: The Rev'd Jack Thompson, Episcopal Church of the Good Shepherd Mobile; Mr. and Mrs. James Wood, Mr. Wood is with the Southern Regional Council; Mr. George Crenshaw, Mr. Liddel Perry, communicants of Good Shepherd in Mobile; The Rev'd Layton Zimmer, "Church and Race Man" for the Episcopal Diocese of Pennsylvania; The Rev'd Warren McKenna, formerly with the Delta Ministry; The Rev'd Kim Driesbach, Ass't Director of Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity; The Rev'd David Nickerson, Southern Field Representative for E.S.C.R.U.; Mr. and Mrs. John Beecher, Mr. Beecher is a poet, a Roman Catholic, they live in Birmingham; an Episcopal priest from Alabama; two Lutheran clergymen from Alabama, one bringing his wife.

A resume of the conference is being compiled from notes. If you would like a copy let us know.

You contributors and supporters of the Project made this conference possible. Thank you. Those of us who attended found it more than worth it.

'The Negroes Just Couldn't Believe It'

How Desegregation Worked Out at Bryce

BY ROBIN REISIG

TUSCALOOSA -- "Mental illness levels people. Alcoholism, schizophrenia, or whatever aren't the province of one race," said Mrs. Barbara Price, a former employee at Bryce Hospital.

Mrs. Price was working at Bryce last April when 30 Negro patients desegregated the all-white mental hospital.

At the same time, 30 white patients desegregated all-Negro Searcy Hospital in Mt. Vernon, near Mobile. About a month later, Governor George C. Wallace ended the experiment in desegregation by transferring the patients back to the hospitals they had come from. He said families of the white patients at Searcy had complained.

But according to Mrs. Price, the experiment worked at Bryce Hospital. She said that staff members and patients accepted desegregation. They knew it "would have meant better salaries, better treatment for everyone because we could have applied for government grants."

Another hospital employee agreed. Mrs. Virginia Dobbins, director of the patient activities department, said that the desegregation was "very successful."

Mrs. Price worked in the patient activities section. The patients, wearing sports clothes, gather together in the department's central room to watch television, play ping pong, read the latest magazines, and chat.

Before the Negroes came to Bryce, Mrs. Price recalled, "A lot of white people had said, 'Oh, I'll never sit with a Negro.' But there was this thing they were all aware of: they were mentally ill; they were all in this situation, and were no longer special."

Then the Negro patients--mostly young boys--showed up. And instead of ignoring them, the white patients were friendly.

"There was a great deal of warmth and understanding expressed from one patient to another," Mrs. Price said. "The Negroes just couldn't believe it; they were bewildered. Then bingo, everyone was moved out."

"I'm sure the Negroes who integrated Bryce thought it was a dream. So maybe it was logic to them that they were deprived of it," she said.

The Negro patients in Alabama's mental hospitals have been deprived of a lot of things that the white patients have. But it didn't begin that way. Bryce Hospital, founded during the Civil War, was integrated until Searcy was built in 1902.

BRYCE MENTAL HOSPITAL IN TUSCALOOSA

Today, both hospitals are made up of large, handsome buildings with spacious grounds which the patients help keep. But--according to Alabama's new governor, Mrs. Lurleen Wallace--both hospitals are "overcrowded and understaffed."

Yet the shortages are not divided equally between the hospitals. Bryce has about 5,000 patients (including close to 400 Negroes, segregated in buildings far away from the main hospital), twice as many as Searcy's 2,500.

But Bryce has 4 1/2 times as many doctors, six times as many psychologists, six times as many social workers, and 7 1/2 times as many registered nurses.

Bryce has 21 medical doctors; Searcy has five. Bryce Rapid Treatment Center No. 2--the hospital's main Negro section--has one. Five of the M.D.'s at Bryce are certified psychiatrists; none of Searcy's psychiatrists are certified. Bryce has six psychologists with Ph.D.'s; Searcy has one. Bryce has 18 social workers; Searcy has three. Bryce has 30 registered nurses; Searcy has four.

The hospitals are roughly even only in number of chaplains--Bryce has three, Searcy has one.

The jobs are not equally divided. None of the doctors, psychiatrists, social workers, or registered nurses at either hospital is Negro. Before the Alabama Department of Mental Health went on the state merit system this fall, nurses' aides and attendants were separated into four groups for salaries, ranging down from "white men," the best paid, through "white women," "colored men," and "colored women."

A man who has worked closely with the hospitals said that the money for patients isn't shared evenly either. Although the state says it spends $3.20 per patient each day, the man said, Searcy actually gets about $2 a day for each patient, while Bryce gets more than $4.

The statistics make it look like Alabama cares more about its white mental patients than its Negro ones. But Robert G. Harris, director of information and public relations for the state's mental institutions, said the figures don't tell the whole story.

Harris said Searcy's patients get psychiatric care even though the hospital has no certified psychiatrist. "All of our M.D.'s are psychiatrists because they're all practicing psychiatry--like if a doctor takes your appendix out, he's a surgeon," the public relations director explained.

He said Bryce has a larger staff than Searcy partly to serve the rapid treatment center for Negroes. (But he admitted that the center has only one doctor, to the hospital's 21.)

SOUL-SEARCHING AT BAYTREAT

'Will We Go On Playing Mr. Charlie?'

BY JOHN C. DIAMANTE

FAIRHOPE--A group of ministers and civil rights workers sat around a roaring fire for three days early this month and tried to figure out where the movement has gone and whether the Christian church should go there too.

The group of about 15 Negro and white people was called together by the Rev. Francis X. Walter, director of the Selma Interreligious Project. It included ministers and laymen who have worked for civil rights up North and down South, not-so-recent events in civil rights.

"Was Selma just three weeks of 'pop race'?" asked Walter. "Or was it a preview of things to come?" No one gave a direct answer.

But nearly everyone welcomed the push for black power. And most people felt that the integrated civil rights movement of the early 1960's was dead.

"We've gone through the social and political phase of the civil rights movement," said Warren McKenna, who used to work with the Delta Ministry in Mississippi. "We're now in the economic phase of the revolution and, baby, that's when

'Will We Go On Playing Mr. Charlie?'

BY JOHN C. DIAMANTE

FAIRHOPE--A group of ministers and civil rights workers sat around a roaring fire for three days early this month and tried to figure out where the movement has gone and whether the Christian church should go there too.

The group of about 15 Negro and white people was called together by the Rev. Francis X. Walter, director of the Selma Interreligious Project. It included ministers and laymen who have worked for civil rights up North and down South.

In the peace and quiet of Baytreat camp, the members of the group sorted out their ideas and feelings about recent and not-so-recent events in civil rights.

"Was Selma just three weeks of 'pop race'?" asked Walter. "Or was it a preview of things to come?" No one gave a direct answer.

But nearly everyone welcomed the push for black power. And most people felt that the integrated civil rights movement of the early 1960's was dead.

"We've gone through the social and political phase of the civil rights movement," said Warren McKenna, who used to work with the Delta Ministry in Mississippi. "We're now in the economic phase of the revolution and, baby, that's when the white man closes the door."

Kim Dreisbach, associate director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, said that black power doesn't mean Negroes and whites can't work for the same ends.

"Coalitions may consist of whites working with whites, and blacks with blacks--attacking a common problem from different flanks rather than always working side by side," he suggested.

Then the group puzzled over the role of white Christians in getting black power. Several white ministers remarked that the churches themselves had done little or nothing to end racism and discrimination.

The institutional church is "one of the central nerves in the system of white America," a minister noted.

"When push comes to shove--when the revolution comes -- even if it's another riot, will we go on playing Mr. Charlie or will we be out there throwing a brick too?" asked another man.

Everybody at the conference agreed that the church wasn't doing the job it should be doing. But different people had different ideas about how to get it back on the right track.

"We start by telling people that their historical, cultural, and economic gods are dead!" one man proposed. Someone objected that people look to the church for stability in a fast-moving society.

"We've got to change that," was the reply. "You've got to tell the middle class that change is coming, and tell the poor that they're going to do it!"

TIME OUT FOR FISHING AT BAYTREAT CAMP

One minister had another question: "I didn't ask for a middle-class, white congregation, so I'm asking, 'What can I do?'"

"Make sure you don't teach any more of them to be Christians like that," came the answer.

The conference didn't come up with any specific plan for revolutionizing the church. But several people agreed in a statement that went like this:

"We are white middle-class, and members of the church; therefore we should do everything possible to expose racism in the church--not by 'study groups,' etc., but by direct action. We should adapt the tools of the movement -- demonstrations, strikes, sit-ins--to 'God's frozen people.'"

TALKING ABOUT THE CHURCH AND CIVIL RIGHTS

Church Called 'Society Of Little Old Ladies'

BY JOHN C. DIAMANTE

FAIRHOPE--"You can bend history," a teacher from the Ecumenical Institute of Chicago told an unusual, week-long course here early this month.

The students, laymen and clergymen from the Mobile and Gulf area, gathered in separate groups at Baytreat to hear some rapid-fire lectures on the Ecumenical Institute's proposal for a new kind of church.

Joseph Mathews, head of the Institute, has explained it like this:

"In the past, we thought the church was the place where you make gentlemen's agreements to like each other. . . which anybody with one ounce of raw, red, human blood knew was for the birds.

"The church became a society of little old ladies of both sexes. The clerics became the kept woman.... If we kept our nose clean, they would send us to Palestine once in a lifetime. Or if we were a Negro, they would give us a Cadillac."

The new church, according to the Ecumenical Institute, must be dedicated to action to improve the world. Then it can lead the way in all kinds of revolutionary movements, including the civil rights movement.

But first, the Institute aimed to let people know just what kind of a world they were living in. The teachers gave lessons on the modern "revolutions" in religion, science, and city living.

The teachers also tried to "unglue" their students from old ways of looking at the world--and to convince them that they could change things for the better.

One way to do that, explained David Scott, a teacher from the Institute, is to give people a new idea of themselves. "We shouted 'Hallelujah' when black power came along," he said, because it fitted right in with the Institute's teachings about self-respect.

The Institute course also stressed the importance of groups of people committed to working together to change things.

"You have to have some way to hold people accountable for doing a job without using the feeling of guilt for not getting the job done," Scott said. "Our image is that one person will do his job. If he's supposed to register 50 voters and comes back without having done it, we're not interested in his excuses. We want to know what his battle plans are for getting them registered tomorrow."

Scott said that this kind of forward - looking discipline could change the course of the whole civil rights movement in big cities like Chicago.

"Groups like SCLC haven't grasped the. . . need for disciplined structure, except in emergency situations," he said. "If SCLC had worked for three months in Chicago like they did in Selma for three weeks, they could have cracked it open."

The people who attended the Institute course were brought together by the Rev. Bill Alerding of Prichard. Not all of them liked it. One minister from Mississippi left half-way through the course. Another complained of "brain-washing."

But those who stayed heard the Institute teachers insist that the "new" church will be responsible for future movements, and eventually, a revolution in civil rights and the whole structure of American life.

Palm Sunday NEWSLETTER March 19, 1967

BOARD CONSIDERS DIRECTIONAL AND FINANCIAL CRISIS

Meeting at Chicago's Ecumenical Institute in January, ESCRU's Board of Directors looked at differences in its own number on the primary role it is believed ESCRU has to play and cast an anxious eye toward the recession in giving generally felt in such organizations around the country. A complete copy of the minutes may be had on request. Officers elected for the year are: President-Malcolm Peabody, Jr.; Vice-President-The Rev. Jesse Anderson; Secretary-Miss Judith Upham; and Treasurer-Mrs. Donald Frey. In addition to the officers, the Executive Committee includes: Mrs. Aaron Oliver, Fr. Earl Neil and Fr. Robert Hood. There was some consensus that ESCRU's primary role is in working within the Church, as, for instance, in the petition effort aimed at Seattle and ways in which ESCRU could focus on clergy placement were discussed. A Special Report on this subject was assigned to Fr. Hood. In another area, the Rev. Bruce Kennedy will do a report on Community Organization, and was also appointed Chairman for planning the program for the Annual Meeting which will convene just prior to General Convention. No easy solutions to the financial crisis were found, with one viewpoint being that ESCRU would simply have to curtail operations commensurate with resources. It was suggested that ESCRU-in-the-Budget is still one of our chief resources needing support. (See budget figures elsewhere in this mailing.) The Rt. Rev. Frederick W. Putnam, Jr., of Oklahoma was elected to fill a vacancy on the Board, and Mrs. Oliver was appointed Chairman of this year's Nominating Committee. The Rev. Henri Stines was reappointed ESCRU's representative to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights .....

CIVIL RIGHTS-1967: WILL WE MOBILIZE THIS TIME?

The post-mortem for last year's civil rights legislation rightly saw much blame at the Church's door for not turning out as in 1964 & 1965. President Johnson has now gone once again to the Congress to seek vitally needed measures affecting discrimination in housing, jury composition reforms (remember the Hayneville trial of Jon Daniels'assailant), protection of persons working for racial justice, the strengthening of equal employment programs, and the work of the U.S.Civil Rights Commission. Write your Senators & Congressman! Get the diocese to speak out! Ask Executive Council's CSR Department if they're going to do the same good job that was done in rallying Churchmen in 1964!

IN MEMORIAM

Stephen and Audrey Currier

Caribbean Sea - January 18, 1967

In mid-February I represented the Episcopal Society at memorial services for this young couple at St. James' Church, New York. It was their generosity which matched the commitment of a handful of Churchmen in 1960 to launch ESCRU. Their dedication to racial unity and justice made the difference in many other similiar endeavors and reveals much about the nature of a stewardship required of all of us.

- John B. Morris

A DECLARATION AND PETITION TO GENERAL CONVENTION

Ten thousand or more Churchmen will journey to the Church's triennial conclave in September to urge a repentent spirit for our common failures regarding cultural and racial unity within the Household and a new determination to work and give for renewal. Some of these will literally go to Seattle, while the greater number will be represented by their signatures affixed to the enclosed ESCRU petition that will be delivered to the General Convention in some dramatic fashion. Originally adopted at the November Annual Meeting, the ESCRU Board at its January meeting determined that the document should be cast in such petitionary form and circulated throughout the the Church with a goal of at least 10,000 names. Bishop Myers, who laid the original statement on the Presiding Bishop's desk last fall, is the Honorary Chairman for the petition drive. Every ESCRU member is asked to gather as many signatures as possible. Additional petition forms may be secured from Atlanta. Several Bishops have already indicated they are endorsing the drive. THE LIVING CHURCH has editorially commended it (see page 5). In some areas a special Sunday will see a concerted drive for Churchmen to stand up and be counted, with many planning this for Whitsunday - May 14th. Every effort should be made to promote this before summer, but petitions may be sent to Atlanta as late as September 10th. Every concerned Episcopalian has the opportunity to be heard in Seattle! It is not limited to ESCRU members, but if each member gets three others to sign we'll double our initial expectation. A massive petitionary effort will serve to elevate the tenor of General Convention and counter the rumored thunder from the right which some anticipate. It will provide a basis and a climate upon which committed Deputies (and we will have quite a few ESCRU members on hand) can build for a more forthright vision and program than came out of the last General Convention.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

As a stop-gap alleviation to the financial crisis we face, ESCRU's Executive Director proposed to the Board and has been granted a six-month non-salaried leave...allowing him, also, time for the reading and writing too lacking since ESCRU got underway seven years ago. This will start April 1st. Our Associate Director will be in charge during the interim and all communications pertaining to ESCRU operations should be directed to him. If the good level of grass roots giving is maintained, we'll break even this year and be better able to discern the future.....

1967 ESCRU BOARD ELECTIONS

Ballots will be distributed to all members prior to the Seattle Annual Meeting with Nominations to the ESCRU Board of Directors. Lay Directors are to be elected this year from Provinces 1,2,3 & 7; with clerical Directors from Provinces 4,5,6 & 8. Send suggestions for nominations to the Chairman of the Nominating Committee: Mrs. Aaron Oliver, 2151 Emerald, San Diego, California 92109. July 17th is the deadline for receipt of suggestions. For a copy of Associate Director Dreisbach's detailed memo on Board Elections this year, write the Atlanta office.

COOPERATIVE LEAGUE TO SHARE OFFICES

Under an arrangement beneficial to both, the Chicago-based Cooperative League of the U.S.A. will use space in the ESCRU offices beginning April 1st for their new Southern program to be staffed by Merlin Miller. The recently retired President of the League was Jerry Voorhis, a former Congressman from California and an active Churchman.

GTS STUDENTS CANCEL GRANT TO SEGREGATED HOME

Upon learning that St. Michael's Farm for Boys at Picayune, Mississippi, is segregated and has no intentions of changing, the Missionary Society of the General Theological Seminary in New York voted 131 to 56 to rescind the grant they had intended giving from offerings this year. Independently of the GTS action, ESCRU investigated the situation and learned that other authorities are questioning the competence of St. Michael's to pursue their role of rehabilitating delinquent boys on grounds other than race. St. Michael's declares itself to be non-sectarian, but maintains a thoroughly Anglican form in the Chapel. The Diocese of Mississippi is giving full consideration to all these factors in an exploration not yet concluded. ESCRU suggests that Churchmen who have supported St. Michael's write to express their concern, and then in the fall contact the Diocese of Mississippi and the national CSR Department for advice on whether to continue support.

HIGH COURT TO RULE ON PRIESTS' SUIT

Arguments were heard before the Supreme Court in January in the case of Pierson vs. Ray, the suit in which four clergy from the ESCRU-sponsored "Prayer Pilgrimage" of 1961 charged Jackson, Miss., police with unlawful arrest, deprivation of civil rights, etc. Unusual constitutional issues arose and the expense now is being shared by the ACLU and the Scholarship, Education & Defense Fund, formerly associated with CORE, with Carl Rachlin remaining as counsel to the plaintifs. Watch the N. Y. TIMES for a detailed report on how the Court rules.

WITHDRAW U.S. TRACKING STATIONS FROM SOUTH AFRICA

The ESCRU office has written numerous government officials in support of the American Committee on Africa's effort to focus attention on segregation at U. S. tracking stations in South Africa. Several Congressmen have expressed the hope that our General Convention reinforce their own efforts in this direction by declaring itself again on Apartheid with specific reference to any and all cooperative programs between our government and South Africa.

PARISHES MERGE IN GEORGIA

In his address before Diocesan Convention, the Bishop of Atlanta reported recently that members of two Negro missions had transferred to previously all-white parishes and that, in at least one instance, Negro communicants had been elected to the Vestry. Contextually speaking, since these situations are in small Georgia communities, it would appear to outdistance much of what passes for progress in the North

Executive Council Accepts Position Paper

In spite of efforts by conservatives, the Church's Executive Council accepted - after modifications - a relatively strong document submitted by the CSR Department treating of the present needs and mood of the country and the Church vis-a-vis race. It offers valuable insights on the subject of Black Power, notwithstanding the fact that the conservatives succeeded in having this term stricken from the title. For a copy of "THE NEGRO AMERICAN AND MUTUAL RESPONSIBILITY AND INTERDEPENDENCE" write the Rev. Quinland Gordon, 815 Second Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017. Fr. Gordon, a veteran of the ESCRU "Prayer Pilgrimage" of 1961, was the chief architect of this excellent document.

OTHER SIGNIFICANT PAPERS

"A Declaration by Priests who are Negroes...." to the Presiding Bishop, treating of personnel policies in the Episcopal Church, is enclosed with this Newsletter. Sufficient copies for ESCRU members were provided by the Rev. Quintin Primo of Wilmington, Delaware, who was one of those instrumental in the drafting of this appeal & charge which the Presiding Bishop has subsequently had sent to all bishops....."The Powell Affair - A Crisis Of Morals and Faith" is a timely document on the significance of the Adam Clayton Powell situation in the Congress. A copy may be obtained by writing: The National Committee of Negro Churchmen, 475 Riverside Drive, Room 552, New York 10027.

SOUTHERN CLERGY NOW LICENSED

ESCRU's Executive Director and the Rev. Francis X. Walter, Director of the Selma Interreligious Project, have had occasion recently to write the Bishops in the dioceses in which they reside to express appreciation for being licensed, while in Florida the Rev. W. Robert Hampshire, a priest-instructor at Florida Memorial College, has been asked by the Archdeacon of the diocese to assist in supplying at a nearby congregation which is without a Vicar.

"CHANGING OF THE GUARD"

ESCRU was represented recently at a reception at Executive Council honoring the Rev. Canon Almon Pepper, retiring Director of the Department of Christian Social Relations, and his two successors, Mrs. Muriel S. Webb, now Acting Director of CSR, and the Rev. Arthur E. Walmsley, who has become Acting Associate Director. Another recent change saw the resignation of the Rev. Cornelius C. Tarplee, now with Uncle Sam's Community Relations Service.

MURRAY'S PEACE: THE LOUISIANA COMPROMISE

Peace-at-all-costs carried the day. A specious harmony now reigns over the Diocese of Louisiana and stands a good chance of becoming the norm for the Church in backlash. No matter that St. Mark's Parish, Shreveport, has been a cancer in the life of the Church, harboring the worst of Episcopal right-wing racism and cunningly through the years seeking to undermine the National Council of Churches & our own Executive Council - all the while withholding funds from their support. They had to become reconciled! (Which is being interpreted, we need their money and, really now, it isn't good for us to have these sharp differences in the Church!)....So what does the Diocese of Louisiana do but appoint a Committee on Tensions. Like having a committee to renew the Church, it was all so simple. With the assistance of the Bishop Coadjutor of Alabama and a conservative Florida railroad executive who counsels the Southern Church to look-away-Dixie-to-M.R.I., the committee came up with the four page report appearing below and on the next page. We are reprinting it in full because it holds so much danger for the entire Church, like a kind of Munich in our efforts to face the crucial issues of the day. The Louisiana diocesan paper offered this insight into their dynamics of compromise: "At the fourth session, the Rt. Rev. George M. Murray, Bishop Coadjutor of Alabama, and Mr. Prime Osborn, of Jacksonville, both members of the National Executive Council, explained in some detail their involvement in Executive Council actions and the degree of success which they have had in representing the conservative approach in many matters concerning the Church of today." An illustration of this success was observed at the Executive Council session in Greenwich on February 16th where Bishop Murray played a leading role in diluting a statement on current racial tensions. Having just won with the conservatives on moderating the title of the document, Murray had to rush off to the airport. As he passed Walker Taylor, the M.R.I. coordinator, Taylor called out: "George....Good job! Good job!" ..... Peace again.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the last day of the 1966 session of the Convention of the Diocese of Louisiana, a Convention delegate requested "that the Bishop appoint a committee to attempt to work out a reconciliation of all parties within the Diocese." The suggestion came as a result of the sharp cleavage which has developed within the Diocese in recent years.

In early February the Bishop, in collaboration with the Bishop Coadjutor, appointed a special committee to explore ways and means of recovering that harmony which the Diocese of Louisiana sorely needs. Three clergy and seven laymen were named. The committee has met four times, with excellent attendance and free discussion.

What is the basis of the cleavage that has sorely affected the church in the Diocese of Louisiana? The specific differences among our people can only be understood and appreciated when they are considered against the background of the enormous social, political, and economic changes we have experienced. Who among us has not been confused, perturbed or concerned?

This committee appreciates that a large number of Episcopalians of this Diocese believe that a distinction between church and state should be observed and that they have been displeased by certain pronouncements and actions of the National Council of Churches and by the Executive Council of our own Church. Protests have been made by individual parishes and missions, in resolutions of Diocesan Conventions, in debate and action at our General Conventions. The serious cleavage within our Diocese, and also within some others, springs from how such displeasure and protest should be registered and made effective. With all Christianity searching for reconciliation and understanding, it is inconceivable that we will permit this breach to widen and worsen.

Within its objective of narrowing or closing the breach, the work of our committee was concerned with four general areas:

(1) Developing an understanding of the thinking of individuals, parishes and missions which led to our present state of cleavage.

(2) Determining the extent of our present agreement which could provide a common ground on which to reunite.

(3) Establishing open communication to bring into focus areas of agreement and aid to developing alternate courses of action to resolve our difference of opinion by holding discussions within the committee itself, with other elements of the Diocese and with our Provincial representatives to the Executive Council of the Church.

(4) Providing a recommendation to the Diocese which would permit reconciliation without major sacrifice of principle or conviction.

After several meetings this committee believes that much common ground has been established, communication channels have been opened and acceptable recommendations have been developed. These actions and recommendations follow in detail.

In its first meeting, your committee sought to define and understand the viewpoints represented. We reviewed complaints made about the NCCCA and our Executive Council, discussed the mission and oneness of the Church, and had prepared a report of progress by the Diocese of Louisiana and its representatives in opposing activities of a political nature of the National Church and the National Council of Churches. The committee agreed that there existed much misunderstanding within the Diocese for various reasons. Primarily, it is a failure to understand and appreciate the position of those holding different opinions partly due to a lack of communication.

Our second meeting, in early June in Shreveport, provided an opportunity for the committee's members to meet with representatives of the Shreveport-area parishes. The committee has considered a resume of the St. Mark's memorandum on church political activity during 1965.

The third meeting of the committee, also held in June, was in New Orleans and involved the New Orleans clericus. There was a lengthy discusison of the church's role in contemporary life; of the beneficial, non-controversial work of the National Council of Churches; of our individual responsibility as Christians and Episcopalians. In executive session following this meeting, the committee began to manifest a general confidence that reconciliation could be achieved without the sacrifice of principle or conviction.

So that we might know firsthand of the work of our Executive Council of the National Church, and of its consideration of the controversial issues before the committee, an audience with members of the Council from our province was requested. Bishop George Murray of Alabama and Mr. Prime Osborn of Jacksonville, Florida met with the committee in late November in New Orleans. Their report of our Executive Council's discussions and actions was encouraging. Their advice and suggestions are incorporated in the spirit of our recommendations to this Convention.

What are our recommendations? There are three.

The committee is convinced that our differences must be reconciled before irreparable damage is done to our Church and Diocese, to our parishes and missions, to individual Episcopalians—to all Christianity. We suggest an open mind; a spirit of love, understanding and tolerance; an adherence to sound principle and belief; and a realization of how much better our talents and energies may be used as soon as this cleavage is eliminated. We ask your thoughtful consideration of our recommendations.

The committee is convinced that the Church must involve itself in life. The determination of when and how is often difficult. We believe that this Church's faith, organization and structure provide the opportunity for involvement, yet with restraint on abuses. In the future we will again do too little, or too much, or both, at the wrong time, but we can always steady on the right course, given time and the opportunity. But at this time corrections in our course can more effectively be made from within by the persuasive influence of individuals, parishes and missions participating fully and unconditionally in the support and work of the Church at every level.

We recommend participation in, and financial support to the limit of our ability, of programs of the Diocese and of the national Protestant Episcopal Church.

The committee is convinced that certain actions and pronouncements by the NCCCA, and the Executive Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, were wrong or ill-advised, and needed to be called to the attention of all Episcopalians. We believe the Church has the right and duty to speak to its people on secular and controversial matters, but not the right to speak for its people unless so authorized. The circumstances that permitted some of what we considered abuses have been protested and some have been changed. Our Bishop voiced "his discontent"; in 1964 the Convention of this Diocese "protested and deplored" certain activities; our General Convention in 1961 and again in 1964 raised questions about the NCCCA and instructed our representatives to inform that body of our concern about some of its statements and activities and our wishes for certain changes in procedure.

That our voice, combined with others, is and has been heard, is confirmed in the heartening reports of Bishop Murray and Mr. Osborn, members of our Executive Council, on their own beliefs and activities and those of the Council. Consideration by that Council of the Church's problems are in better perspective; staff activities of our National Church and the NCCCA are being monitored more carefully; the authority, direction and guidance of the Presiding Bishop is more fully exercised. The Executive Council of the National Church has officially informed the NCCCA that it is not to speak for or in the name of the Episcopal Church, or its members, unless specifically authorized to do so by the General Convention, The House of Bishops, or the Executive Council. The committee was gratified to hear a report of discussion on this subject at the Fberuary 1966 Executive Council meeting. The Presiding Bishop "stated that it is his opinion that when our Representatives have called the attention of the General Board or of is Executive Committee (of the NCCCA), concerning any proposed action, that this Church has taken no stand thereon, and have sought, in discussion, to restrain those bodies from presenting formal proposals, they are then free, as individual Christians, to vote their convictions in the premises.

The Presiding Bishop, finally, stated his firm position against the identifying of any specific legislation as being the embodiment of "the" Christian position.

We recommend to the Convention that gratitude and support be tendered to Bishop Murray and Mr. Osborn for their assistance; that the Bishops, the clergy and lay people of this Diocese all resolve to better acquaint Louisiana Episcopalians with the work of our National Church and its Executive Council; that this Convention carefully and deliberately elect its delegates to the General Convention and Provincial Synod wih full recognition of the importance of viewpoints they will represent and of the serious nature of their deliberations, decisions and pronouncements—to the end that we may be effectively heard on issues of importance to us now and in the future.

This committee further recommends that for 1967 the Budget of the National Church and the Budget of this Diocese be considered as integral parts of our Church's work and that if any adjustments between the total program budget as proposed in September and the total program budget submitted to Convention should be necessary, then both that portion which applies to the Diocese and that portion which is asked by the National Church shall be adjusted by the same percentage so as to reflect the financial support of all our parishes and missions. This recommendation is consistent with the principle of the "partnership plan" of stewardship which will be considered at the 1967 General Convention. Under present canons, the recommendation refers only to the Program Budget or Asking. If the Diocesan Program Budget and the Convention Budget should be consolidated, the total of this unified budget would be adjusted with the budget of the National Church in the same manner.

The committee believes that adoption of this report by the Convention may provide a satisfactory solution to our differences. The scripture which Bishop Jones used to close his 1966 address to this Convention is especially meaningful. From the second chapter of the First Epistle of John:

"Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye have had from the beginning. . . . And this is the message that ye had from the beginning, that we should love one another."

This report is respectfully submitted for adopted by this Convention.

HERE AND THERE

There's been justifiable concern over OEO treatment of Mississippi's CDGM headstart program, with the fallout descending on the government-favored MAP headstart effort. Now comes KKK-type violence against MAP workers, as when they bombed the home of Mrs. Jane Schutt of Jackson whom many ESCRU members will remember from the 1965 Annual Meeting. It would appear that CDGM and MAP are equally anathema to those who are resisting change in Mississippi.....According to the February 9th DALLAS TIMES HERALD Bishop Mason of Dallas assured his people that neither he nor the diocese had any part in inviting Bishop Pike and Fr. Malcolm Boyd to address a NCC meeting which convened there recently.....Several ESCRU members were among those arrested convicted recently in a Detroit courtroom for involvement in a demonstration last fall aimed at sub-standard housing and urban renewal procedures.....And in New Rochelle, N. Y., former NYC Chapter Chairman Fr. Lorentho Wooden was among those arrested in a protest action aimed at discrimination against Negroes on construction jobs at an urban renewal site.....But in California 63% of 338 Episcopal Church women expressed themselves in a survey as being against participation by Church leaders in civil rights demonstrations that could lead to their being arrested.....In Alabama there is a parish with a 1967 Proposed Budget of $22,843.00 which has ESCRU-in-the-Budget for $100.00, a significant amount from such a source - and they've always been true to their word in what they have proposed the Society. It would be good if lots more could do the same.....And South Africa is now moving against clergy from other countries who serve there and who oppose Apartheid, including at least one ESCRU priest-member who has been required to leave recently.....While in Detroit recently Churchmen saw two front-page stories on former Michigan Suffragans doing the Lord's work: In San Francisco, Bishop Myers was installed as diocesan; and the other headline: "Bishop DeWitt Fights On as Philadelphia Seethes".....And along the Coastal South come the annual announcements of Church-sponsored garden and home tours which a few "tour-ins" would probably consign to secular auspices.

REFLECTIONS FROM ONE TAKING LEAVE - I was just looking for a space for these remarks and didn't plan it this way, but the two inserts below graphically reveal the dual focus I've always believed to be an ESCRU responsibility: Work for renewal and change within the Church, and witness without in the general community. So what's new about that! Don't we all agree? I'm not sure, although I think the preponderant committment in ESCRU is thusly directed. But now comes the disarray within the "movement" and a parallel directional crisis in ESCRU. I think we discern now a coalition of ingredients which have these past seven years been harmoniously bound together by history and the needs we've faced. It's too simple to make a dichotomy, but you have to for the sake of drawing the issue out. Essentially, in ESCRU we have been those who cared tremendously about the involvement of the Church in "the movement", but really don't care deeply about the renewal of the Church; and there are those who care tremendously about the renewal of the Church and who deeply believe that one aspect of this is involvement in the "movement" or whatever else predominates on the secular scene. Indeed, for the latter group, in which I count myself, there must necessarily always be the dual emphasis and involvement. It is of the nature of the Church. In the priorities that have to be weighed at a national office, with limited staff and finances, I lay more store by national ESCRU concentrating on the internal matters having to do with change and renewal and change in the Church - simply because there is no other free-wheeling organization able or interested in this - but at the local chapter level, obviously the sacred and secular are inseperable. There are those, though, who would have national ESCRU place internal matters secondary and presume to play some substitutionary role for all the failures of the Church in the community. Our genius has been to exert far greater influence than our resources would suggest in pressing here and there from within to cause our 3-million leviathan to move a little - albeit in what some call "churchy" matters. It is naive to think that ESCRU is capable at the national level of being some super Civil Rights organization. We are simply a voice of concern within a larger household....Moving the office North, throwing ourselves nationally into any specific panacea (e.g. - community organization) which is today's latest thing in the nearly-defunct movement, etc., all miss the mark of what ESCRU has and can do within the area in which it is competent to make a difference.....That it is so often said: "Why doesn't ESCRU do such and such...?" is testimony to our suceess in being seen as, in fact, the Church at work in Christian Social Relations concerns, but it often reveals an unrealistic concept of what we've done and can do, while at the same time it very well may be ESCRU's role to try to direct the official agencies of the Church more toward new programs and commitments. ESCRU isn't the Church, but must care deeply about renewal within that constantly moves out.-JBM

The ESCRU Petition

(THE LIVING CHURCH - February 26,1967)

With some reservations about the use in it of one word, we approve the declaration and petition to the 62d General Convention put forth by the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity (see page 5). We shall sign it, and urge others to sign it, for this simple and sufficient reason: the situation to which it calls attention exists in the Episcopal Church — indeed, is normal in the Church — and it is wrong; sinfully, inexcusably wrong. It is hard to see how any Churchman, arguing on Christian grounds, could take issue with this statement.

Our one semantic difficulty is with the use of the term "heretical" to describe the Church's denial in practice of what it preaches and professes about brotherhood in Christ. If the Church formally taught what it all too commonly practices, this would be heretical. To say that some Christians because of the color of their skin should be consigned to a special place in the Church's life, a place befitting that second-class citizenship of the kingdom of God which God wills for them, would be heretical, i.e. false doctrine; false, that is, if Christianity is true. Therefore we prefer to call the Church's common practice something that is worse than heretical in our books — hypocritical and sinful. (The heretic may not know any better; the hypocrite and sinner does.)

The official position of the Church touching this matter is put forth clearly enough, and with the force of law binding upon all its members, in its Canon 16, sec. 4: "Every communicant or baptized member of this Church shall be entitled to equal rights and status in any Parish or Mission thereof. He shall not be excluded from the worship or Sacraments of the Church, nor from parochial membership because of race, color, or ethnic origin."

Every single factual assertion in the ESCRU statement concerning the Church's sins of omission and commission — mostly the former — is only too true, and calls not for nit-picking argument but for sincere repentance and an honest effort toward amendment of institutional life on every level — administrative, diocesan, parochial, and personal. Perhaps we should have put "personal" first. It would be well for every Churchman looking at this ugly reality in the Church's life to begin with the prayer which the fear-ridden friends of Jesus offered when He told them that He was about to be betrayed: "Lord, is it I?"

PICKETING THE GOVERNORS WALLACE

Reverend Samuel Williams, Morehouse College professor and former head of the Atlanta NAACP and Reverend John Morris of the Episcopal Society of Culture and Racial Equality, led the picket line that greeted Alabama's Governor Lurleen Wallace and her husband, George, Tuesday at their address before the General Assembly. Slightly more than 100 pickets joined the line to express, "The Governors Wallace Do Not Speak For The South." (Lens-News Service Photo) - ATLANTA INQUIRER - March 4, 1967

A Vital Issue -

Clergy Placement:

Bishop Hallock's statement at the ordination of Father Benefee (see p. 8) is indeed timely. It calls upon all of us to come to grips with the age-old time-honored practice of assigning clergy by race. Here, as in other areas of her own life, the Church has fallen victim to the same "de facto segregation" which characterizes so much of American life, and intensifies the separation of the members of the body of Christ. Bishop Hallock's words give hope for the alleviation of one significant factor of separateness in our diocese.

The placement of Negro clergy has raised considerable dis cussion in recent years. A survey conducted by ESCRU in 1964 found that only a handful of Negro clergy were in any kind of interracial ministry. It was also revealed that candidates for holy orders had been discouraged by some bishops from entering seminary - because there was no forseeable vacancy in a "Negro parish". A delegation of Negro clergy to the House of Bishops meeting in Montana in 1965 was favorably received but to date there has been slight implementation of the bishops' subsequent resolutions.

The issue of clergy placement received major attention at the annual convention of ESCRU in New York City last November. A group of approximately 20 Negro clergy, genuinely concerned with the "apathetic conscience of the Church in the midst of the American racial crisis", presented their views to the convention in a paper, part of which was incorporated in the ESCRU charge of "heresy". (see December issue of The Churchman) Convention delegates were urged to work for solutions by raising the issue of clergy placement in their home dioceses.

At the December meeting of Wisconsin ESCRU at Trinity Church, Wauwatosa, Fr. Earl Neil of Chicago spoke of ESCRU's efforts there to achieve equity for priests of Negro ancestry. He felt that this was one concrete area where an ESCRU chapter might be effecti e.

Bishop Hallock's forthright statement should prepare the way for more priests of minority group backgrounds to be called to serve the Diocese of Milwaukee.

MONTANA FOLLOW-THROUGH: Six priests from ESCRU "haunted" the 1965 meeting of the House of Bishops, supporting the adoption of a declaration by the Bishops that non-racial guidelines should prevail in the assignment & calling of clergy. One Bishop voted for the statement, but declared it wouldn't make any difference in his diocese. More faithful Shepherds have begun to extend the implications of the Montana Declaration, as in these excerpts from the diocesan papers in Milwaukee and in Chicago.....

"TAKE THOU AUTHORITY TO EXECUTE THE OFFICE OF A PRIEST.."

The ordination of the Rev. Lee Maur Benefee to the sacred order of priesthood is a joyful occasion. At the same time we are called to bear in mind that this ordination and all ordinations are occasion for solemn reflections. For us in the Diocese of Milwaukee this particular ordination calls us to reflect joyously and yet solemnly that the Church does not ordain Negro priests, nor does she ordain white priests, but only Catholic priests--priests of the whole Church of God.

Why do we feel called upon to say this, which surely seems obvious? Because it is not obvious. It is a deplorable fact that priests of Negro ancestry have been restricted in their ministry almost entirely to so called "Negro parishes." They have been considered "Negro priests".

We want it clearly understood now that Fr. Benefee is not being ordained a "Negro Priest". And we want to make it manifestly clear that Fr. Benefee is serving at St. George's parish because of the particular needs for an interracial ministry in that parish at this time and not because he cannot serve elsewhere in this diocese. We fully believe that he will be called to serve elsewhere. Furthermore we look forward to having more priests of Negro ancestry, and more interracial ministries, in our diocese in the future.

The charge is laid upon all of us, the Bishop, the Clergy, the laity, and more especially the elected representatives on vestries to seek out ways by which the lives of all of us may be enriched as we acknowledge but one family of God, containing men of every race and nation, and share together the rewards of genuine interracial living.

And so we do rejoice in the ordination of Fr. Benefee, the first priest of Negro ancestry in our diocese; and we solemnly reaffirm our intention -- as with God's help we are able -- to work for the day when ordaining a priest of Negro ancestry in the Diocese of Milwaukee will not be special news but a simple and natural part of our way of life.

Given under my hand and seal this 21st day of December, 1966, being the Feast of St. Thomas, and now formally signed as the pledge of my own intention.

The Bishop of Milwaukee

THE BISHOP OF CHICAGO'S PASTORAL LETTER ON CLERGY PLACEMENT

It is the duty of your Bishop from time to time to focus the attention of the Church in this Diocese upon matters of corporate concern and responsibility. One of these, which is well known to all of you, grows from the awakened conscience of the churches regarding racial justice. Our own Church is actively engaged with other Christians and religious bodies in attempting to arouse our society to guarantee to all people equal opportunity for decent housing, fair employment and good education.

Yet even as the Church undertakes this work, there are inequities within the life of the Church herself. In the realm of equal opportunity for racial minorities among us, our ears must burn at the sound of our Lord's query: "Why do you look at a speck of sawdust in your brother's eye, with never a thought for the great plank in your own." (S. Matthew 7:3, New English Bible)

We need constantly to examine our personal attitudes and preconditioned reactions to members of other races in terms of the Law of God revealed in the life and teaching of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Do we indeed "love our neighbors as ourselves?"

One questionable facet of the Church's life which has been uncritically assumed or ignored for many years is the placement of Negro clergy. The unfortunate fact is that we have practiced segregation at the very heart of our own church life. A priest is ordained to minister to all the people of God, and yet we prevent the free and full exercise of this ministry.

It is my intention to move actively to eradicate this evil within the life of the Church, and I will need the prayers, good will and cooperation of all the clergy and people of the Diocese.

From now on, Negro clergy will be nominated to any vestry or Bishop's committee of any parish or mission seeking a new rector or vicar. I am placing it on the consciences of the members of vestries and Bishop's committees to give equal consideration to any priests, Negro and white, who are so nominated.

I am asking Bishop Montgomery to place seminarians without regard to their color or race in congregations for summer work and to provide the names of Negro priests for supply and summer vacation assignments wherever such assistance may be needed.

Let us pray earnestly that our people will respond with Christian courage and love to this opportunity to witness in our corporate life to the faith that we claim is in us.

I am fully aware of the many problems this mandate may present to the local scene particularly in the matter of housing, community relations and possibly in arousing latent prejudice now quietly ignored, but this is a price the Church must pay if it is truly to proclaim the gospel of her Lord and Master both at His altars and in the world outside.

Be assured, brethren, of my complete willingness as your chief pastor and friend, to share with each and all of you, the consequences of this determination. I acknowledge my share of the sin which has too long frustrated the Church's mission to all men.

May the almighty and ever merciful God forgive each and all of us. May He give us the wisdom, courage and love to amend our personal and corporate lives. May He sustain us all in enduring the difficulties which may rise up before us. May He bring us, finally, to the enjoyment of our full and unhindered fellowship with each other in the bonds of His perfect love.

IF YOU SAW THE ARTICLE: Then, here's my Letter to the Editor - "While I do feel pessimistic about the role of the Church in the South's changing racial patterns, as suggested in Marshall Frady's perceptive 'God and Man in the South' in the January issue of ATLANTIC, I shall never cease working for a stronger Church & never would I say that I would "...just as soon see it all go down the drain", an expression not common to me. It will never be too late for the recovery of integrity within the Church, insofar as faithfulness is concerned, however irrelevant this may be to an increasingly polarized situation. I do not, in other words, partake of the "legacy of despair" Mr. Frady attributes to many Southern Churchmen, nor of any "ultimate pessimism", although I think there is ample cause for such. There will be those who will give up and withdraw - even from the Church - because of this. There are others of us who can not deny our inheritance in this family, however sick its present institutional life may be." (signed) The Rev. John B. Morris, Executive Director, ESCRU FIGHT - EASTMAN KODAK: ESCRU Members Urged To Act Now! - The Rev. Albert R. Dreisbach, Jr.

In September of 1966 FIGHT (Freedom-Integration-God-Honor-Today), a community organization developed by Saul Alinsky and sponsored by the Rochester area Council of Churches, approached Kodak with a proposal calling for the development of a partnership program for the recruitment, selection, hiring & training of 600 hardcore, unemployed people. After several months, negotiations reached an impasse. Finally, on December 20, 1966, an agreement was signed by FIGHT and Kodak officials. Under the agreement, FIGHT's services were to be those of recruitment and maintaining a motivational counseling relationship to those accepted into the program, while Kodak pledged itself to a new training and hiring program for 600 unemployed over a 24-month period. Two and one half days later, to the complete surprise of FIGHT and the Kodak negotiating committee, Louis Eilers publicly voided the agreement. FIGHT heard this news over the 11:00 P.M. news with everyone else.

Following the voiding of the agreement, there were two meetings between FIGHT and Kodak in which FIGHT attempted to get the agreement reworded to satisfy any objections to it. A third meeting was mutually agreed upon, but Kodak stood up FIGHT. On February 21st, Kodak issued a statement that it would not consider any further meetings with FIGHT on this matter.

At stake now is the self-image of the Negro community and recognition of its organized voice and symbol. The urgency of frustration and unrest is at a near-breaking point. The nation's churches are greatly needed in this battle, for the issues being raised have implications for Negroes and poor people throughout the land. To all those of us who are appalled by racism and institutional irresponsibility toward the poor, this issue offers a concrete opportunity and a challenge.

Appropriate Actions:

1. Send letters to FIGHT, 86 Prospect Street, Rochester, N. Y. 14608, indicating your support of their actions;

2. Send telegrams or letters to Mr. Louis K. Eilers, President, Eastman Kodak Corporation, 232 State Street, Rochester, N. Y. 14614, expressing your dismay with Kodak's breaking of the agreement and refusal to face the poor;

3. Send letters to the Editors of newspapers giving the facts on the situation and expressing your concern.

4. Locate friends and institutions who own shares of Kodak stock. Notify FIGHT immediately by mail or phone (ID 6-9880) with the name, address, phone and number of shares owned. FIGHT will then contact the stockholders in an attempt to gain their proxy for the annual meeting to be held in Flemington, N. J., on April the 25th.

5. If you're a stockholder and can go, attend the Kodak meeting and let your voice be heard!

NOT SUCH HOT READING LATELY is The Episcopalian, our house organ which plays its role all too safely. Of course they do have bits and pieces about controversial matters every now and then, and there will be an occasional light-weight article about something important everyone agrees on (and they do carry Malcolm Boyd's film reviews). but it can't compare with numerous other denominational publications, including, for instance, PRESBYTERIAN SURVEY published in the South for an all-Southern denomination, and it wouldn't even be fair to compare it with various Roman Catholic periodicals such as JUBILEE, AVE MARIA, COMMONWEAL, NATIONAL CATHOLIC REPORTER, etc., most of which, it is true, enjoy a non-establishment sponsorship. But, then, THE EPISCOPALIAN is really way out when laid alongside such innocuous sheets as the Anglican Press's OUR CHURCH TIMES - a partly-printed-parish-paper, which might just as well have been left all blank.

Chapel Named For Slain Seminarian

"If in Selma our baptism made us 'white niggers,' it also made us Alabama whites. We had to accept the guilt as well as the pain."

Those words, written by Jonathan Daniels a few months before his death in 1965, were read last month at St. Clement's, Manhattan, by the Rev. Michael T. Stichweh, assistant minister at Incarnation, Manhattan. The occasion was the dedication on Church and Race Sunday of the Jonathan Daniels Memorial Chapel at St. Clement's. Jonathan Daniels was the young seminarian from New Hampshire who was shot to death Aug. 20, 1965, as he was working on voter registration in Alabama. Fr. Stichweh was one of his classmates at Episcopal Theological Seminary, Cambridge, Mass.

The Rev. John Morris, executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity (ESCRU), preached the sermon in the service preceding the dedication, and called the martyred seminarian "a contemporary saint—a holy man of God that passeth by—whose life shines like a jewel." Fr. Morris, a Virginia Seminary classmate of St. Clement's vicar, the Rev. Eugene A. Monick, Jr., worked closely with Jonathan Daniels in Ala. and accompanied his body home after his death.

WORK NOT FINISHED

"Jonathan Daniels' work will not be finished," Fr. Morris declared, "as long as our congregations gather in their 'separate but equal' churches to worship God." He scored the Church generally for raising "not an outcry" at the Daniels shooting, but rather "maintaining an embarrassed silence. After all, shooting even prospective clergy just isn't done."

ALSO TAKING PART

Also taking part in the service was Mrs. Philip Daniels, mother of the murdered young man. She was accompanied by the Rev. William J. Schneider, Episcopal chaplain at Harvard and Radcliffe, whose book, "Jonathan Daniels, His Letters and Papers," is scheduled for Sept. publication by Seabury Press.

Serving as sub-deacon with Fr. Monick was Bruce Lawrence, a student at Episcopal Theological Seminary, who represented the school. Robert Edwin, guitarist, performed the music of the folk mass for the Service of the Eucharist.

NEWS NOTES FROM CHAPTERS

Boston ESCRU sponsored showings of "A Time for Burning" and James Baldwin's "Blues for Mr. Charlie".....Houston raised $500.00 for the national office in their showing of "Nothing But a Man", but their primary target lately has been the segregated St. John's School. The Chapter promoted the adoption of a resolution at diocesan convention concerning the use of Church property for any segregated program or activity.....Youngstown ESCRU raised money for the Church & Race Fund, which other groups pushed around the country, and they have been backing 'Operation Freedom", a Cincinnati-based effort to alleviate conditions in economically-stricken Southern areas....San Diego had a very attractive booth at diocesan convention featuring Freedom Quilting Bee products (see enclosed flyer on the Bee which Fr. Walter of the Selma Interreligious Project helped to start. ESCRU handles S.I.P.'s bookkeeping as a service to this work which is following in traditions of service Jon Daniels started) .....Newark ESCRU reports a campaign to get the ESCRU petition signed, with both bishops adding their names to the list of Episcopal supporters....Philadelphia is also working on the petition (and we hope all Chapters are!).....Washington ESCRU did some good political organization work in getting strong persons elected to 11 out of 16 positions in the diocese.....Cleveland's recent programs have included such topics as "The Culture of Poverty" and "The Church School in the Inner City".....Chicago's and Milwaukee's good work in the area of clergy placement concerns is seen in statements from their Bishops with whom they have maintained a close, working relationship

2. As indicated above in the Personnel & Rent breakdown, this budget anticipates the 6 month leave of absence requested of the Board of Directors by the Executive Director as a stop-gap remedy for the financial crisis. An underlying assumption is that ESCRU will not be able to continue to have two professional staff persons.
3. ESCRU's Southern Field Service Program, supported by a terminal grant from the Field Foundation which expires in July of 1968, is not included in this budget; nor is the Selma Interreligious Project which we service in the handling of receipts & disbursements.

Literature Sales	1,540.95	557.10	500.00

(* - $5,000.00 or more under Large Contributions received in 1966 was derived from sources not expected to be repeated in 1967.)

SOME CONCLUSIONS: Even on a cut-back basis, ESCRU must look toward a continued solid support by the grass-roots members, with a special push by Chapters for getting parishes to make ESCRU-in-the-Budget a permanent commitment. Substantial individual contributions form too precarious a base for long-term security. - John Morris

A Declaration, by Priests who are Negroes, on the Personnel Policies and Practices of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America; Addressed to the Presiding Bishop, The Rt. Rev. John E. Hines, and to the Members of the House of Bishops, and to the Executive Council

We, who are priests of the Episcopal Church, are filled with anguish by an unrighteous and scandalous system that has been allowed to exist within the House of God. Throughout the history of the Christian Church, our faith has been glorified by men and women who have become saints because they were committed to the proposition of the oneness of all in the family of God. To have done less than give their all to confirm this universality and equality would, to them, have been scandalous.

Yet, today, at all levels of the Church's life — in neighborhood congregations, in diocesan committees and commissions, and in the organization of the national Church there can be seen a subtle and a well-nigh systematic exclusion of laity and clergy who are Negroes from the heart of the Church's life. The personal piety of so many communicants permits them to ignore the Christian social responsibilities of the Church. Could they be resurrected, our honored saints would be appalled by the fact that such distortions of the Body of Christ should exist at all. These beatified souls would be even more shocked by the fact that large numbers of our brethren are doubtless so immured from and accustomed to these conditions in the Household of God that they have permitted them to exist unchanged for so long a time.

In today's multi-racial and fractured world, the God-desired inclusion of Negro men and women in all areas of the Church could be "living, holy and reasonable" testaments to the fact that all men be reconciled is the will of God. Is there any wonder that the widespread and systematic denial of participation by Negro men and women in all aspects of the faith is a source of grievous pain not only to Negro priests in the Episcopal Church, but also to many of the faithful throughout the world?

A partial recognition of the unholy nature of this exclusion is evidenced by the many "amiable" statements about the Church's becoming a truly open Church. However, no person committed deeply to the proposition that true fulfillment for all mankind can come only at the Cross where all are one could be other that grievously troubled by the deliberate or inadvertent exclusion of so many of the faithful from the House of God.

This grief, coupled with skepticism, has begun to increase among all Negro Churchmen, as well as among many others of the faithful who feel God's designs and desires are being thwarted within the Church. The dismay over inaction within the Church is compounded by the fact that many other major institutions in our culture appear to have made far more progress toward Christian ideals than has the Episcopal Church.

Finding this hard to reconcile, Negro Episcopal Churchmen and their sons and daughters are turning to other communions where they see fewer of such injustices.

What is this record within the Episcopal Church?

Here and there — but only with great rarity — "token" appointments of Negro priests and Negro laymen have been made to diocesan posts and to administrative or executive assignments in national offices. Bishops, with few exceptions, however, appear to have been notably slothful in making new opportunities of ministry available to Negro clergy. Their talents are not being fully used on diocesan or cathedral staffs. Nor are they normally sponsored for any work other than that which is related to Negro congregations. And only with great infrequency have Negro priests been deemed eligible for posts in the Executive Council. For example, The Executive Council has grown from six Departments with a total of three Divisions in 1948 to the present eleven Departments composed of over twenty Divisions in 1967. Each Department is administered by a Director and each Division is administrated by an Executive Secretary. This would make a total of some thirty persons in executive positions. But in nearly two decades since 1948 there have been only two Negro Executive Secretaries. One of them was the Executive Secretary of the now defunct division of "Racial Minorities." And no Negro has served as Director of a Department.

Or again, out of about seventy-eight professors and associate professors in twelve theological schools and seminaries of the Church in the United States there has been ony one full-time professor in the last two decades.

Or again, in the Joint Urban Board of the Home Department where the problem of racial minorities looms like a threatening storm over the inner-city Church there are no Negroes.

The personnel problems in the Church have been more of a spiritual matter than a shortage of trained man-power. Trained and experienced Negroes have had to stand aside and see less qualified whites given opportunities to learn the responsibilities of significant positions because the Church lacked faith in God or the spiritual maturity to appoint or elect Negroes. The exclusion of the Negro layman from diocesan committees and commissions and from national conferences of the Church seems equally systematic and tragic.

The real meaning of Christian evangelism, it has been said, is one hungry man telling another hungry man where the Bread of Life is to be found. A priest's vocation is to continue the Incarnation unto his own time. His integrity is intimately linked with the consecration of the holy bread and wine of the Eucharist. How can the Negro priest tell the people of his own generation and within his own Church where the Bread of Life is to be found in the limitless Kingdom of God when he is himself so severely limited by the Episcopal Church in the offering of his holy gifts and talents as a servant of our Saviour? Up to now, the Negro priest has been made to feel unworthy to offer unto Him any sacrifice except in all Negro or predominantly Negro circumstances.

He has been made to feel the sting of being cut off from the blessed company of all God's faithful people. He has been made to feel the chagrin of an "invisible people" within the Body of Christ as it is found in the Episcopal Church. And thus, we are compelled to ask if this is to be the cost of our discipleship as clergy and laity of the Episcopal Church.

God's boundless province can be reflected by the Church not only by fully opening its doors to all, but also by doing all things possible to rectify the inglorious past.

So, weighed down as we are by our own disappointment and by the growing disenchantment of those to whom we minister, we do strongly and respectfully urge the Presiding Bishop and the Executive Council to arrange a series of meetings as early as possible in 1967 between a representative group of Bishops of the Church and a representative group of Negro clergy of the Church so that the issues which are stated in this Declaration may begin to get the kind of careful and factual examination they deserve. This should be done with the view that the Presiding Bishop and the Executive Council will make specific recommendations on these matters to the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies of the 1967 General Convention.

The issues are:

1. The doubt that is cast upon the integrity of the whole Church, when it accepts Negroes or anyone as postulants for the sacred ministry only if their work is to be in a limited area in contrast to the God-desired areas where there are no bounds;

2. The use of one set of criteria by the hierarchy in missions and by vestries in parishes for the placement of Negro clergy and of another set of criteria for the placement of white clergy;

3. The use of one set of criteria by Bishops and Diocesan Committees for the placement of Negro men of God in diocesan and national Church positions, and of another set of criteria for the placement of white clergy;

4. The exclusion of Christian scholars from the faculties of seminaries and private schools of the Church solely because of race. There should be the same criteria and intensive searching of our schools in seeking out Negroes for available faculty positions as is exercised in seeking out white persons for faculty positions; and,

5. The pursuit of creative means to compensate for the grievous injustices of the past. And the setting a course of Christian action implementing our noblest resolutions concerning the total integration of racial minorities in the Church.

A DECLARATION AND PETITION:

TO THE 62nd GENERAL CONVENTION OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

September 17 – 27, 1967

Seattle, Washington

We, the undersigned members of the Episcopal Church, charge ourselves and the Church to which we belong and which we love with heretical and blasphemous distortion of the Christian doctrine of man. In our common life we have not only distorted much of the apostolic teaching, but we have permitted heretical structures to grow up in our midst.

We have created parishes that are, in practice, privileged sanctuaries serving to further suburban white segregation. We have accepted a tradition of clergy placement which treats priests of color as though they were inferior and incapable of ministering at our altars and pulpits to the whole people of God. Our efforts in Christian Education reflect an image of false dignity and human separation. We have perpetuated the economic and moral inequalities of discrimination by our Church's financial investments and its building and purchasing policies.

The result of this racism at the very heart of the Church's life is an inability to address its mission to the crucial issues in the life of the country. The Church has retreated from some aspects of the phrase "Black Power", preferring, it would seem, to continue the status quo of white power and supremacy. We have too much accepted the fact that the vast majority of our members live in segregated neighborhoods, tending to justify continued buying and selling in a segregated housing market. We have acquiesced to discriminatory practices of employment by unions and employers, condoning them by our silence.

We have done little to equalize educational opportunities. We have failed to address ourselves to the turning of our material blessings toward the establishment of full opportunity for all people. In our largely fragmented life together we continue to commit the ultimate sin – that of fostering the separation of man from man. Though intended to affirm the unity of all men, our practice of Baptism and Eucharist generally reflects the separation of men, and not their oneness in the life which is in Christ Jesus.

We must repent and heed the call to renewal by our Fathers-in-God, the Bishops, who have proposed a council for the renewing of the Church in our day. We ask all in authority at the Church's 62nd General Convention to join us in this declaration of repentence and to support a program and budget for the next triennium which will acknowledge with urgency and dedication the Church's apostolate to seek the fulfillment of Our Lord's wish 'that they all may be one'.

As members of this part of Christ's Church we pledge ourselves to work unceasingly in behalf of the Bishops' call for renewal, praying that we and all Churchmen may be open to the recreating life of the Holy Spirit. In this common repentence and declaration of intention we take our stand with those in Seattle who realize that there can be no choice now if we are to be found faithful. We await their guidance and counsel for the days ahead.

The Freedom Quilting Bee

The Freedom Quilting Bee is a handcraft cooperative. It was organized in March of 1965 with over 150 women joining together to market quilts, sun bonnets, pot holders and other items of handwork and stitchery. The Freedom Quilting Bee has managed to teach new skills to old fingers, establish quality control of products, and infuse a spirit of dignity in individual accomplishment, all with a cooperatively agreed upon financial return for each member.

Quilting has been practiced continuously in Black Belt Alabama for 140 years. While Freedom Quilting Bee quilts derive from classic American patterns they are distinctly different from the more common Appalachian or New England types. The imaginative designs are decorative in the bold use of color and the strong contrasts between border combinations and blocks. It has been said that some of the designs are unconscious forms of Op art but perhaps the flattened abstracted designs just give a warmth in appearance not often seen in today's style of quilt making. Repetition is not one of the quilt maker's virtues. Each quilt is unique.

This small venture began with a $300.00 loan from the Episcopal Society's Jonathan Daniels Memorial Fund. Its primary purpose is to make available to a woman the opportunity to earn supplemental income. A cottage industry.

Many quilters and members of their families have been active in the Civil Rights Movement. For some this has meant eviction from house and land, foreclosure of loans, and the end of credit. These burdens, coupled with the automation of cotton farming have forced into being a number of cooperative experiments.

Rural Negroes across the South are using co-ops in an attempt to earn their own way. The Freedom Quilting Bee is one of these. The average annual income per family in this cooperative is under $800.00. Profits are small but in nine months twenty women have increased their family income 10 to 25 per cent through the co-op.

The formation of the Freedom Quilting Bee was initiated by the Selma Inter-religious Project which is an inter-faith ministry to Selma and central Alabama. It is sponsored by religious groups that participated in the Selma March: Roman Catholic, Jewish, Protestant and Unitarian. The director of the Project serves as chairman of the cooperative's advisory committee.

The Freedom Quilting Bee could not exist without the help of many people. Your help is invited. Clothing scraps from both sewing baskets and textile or garment factories are very much needed. Individuals or groups may send these parcel post or by R.E.A. The co-op needs help in making its products known to gift shops and boutiques.

Tax deductible donations may be made to the co-op's technical assistance fund. Checks may be made to

The Alabama Council of Human Relations, Inc.
Freedom Quilting Bee Fund
P. O. Box 1310
Auburn, Alabama 36830

The Alabama Council administers this fund. Churches and clubs have helped by holding auctions. Receipts from benefits and auctions are tax deductible if checks are written as indicated above.

The co-op normally makes standard size quilts for double and single beds, and baby beds. In filling orders for these the Quilting Bee tries to match requests for designs and predominant colors. Quilts are either black and white, or two solid colors, vari-colored prints, or mixtures of solids and prints.

Orders in which size, design, colors and fabric are specifically requested can be filled. In such cases some prefer to send all or part of the fabric.

Quilts from stock are $20.00 and $25.00 depending on size and complexity of design. Baby quilts are $12.00, King size quilts may be especially ordered. Sun bonnets are $3.00, pot holders with original designs $1.00.

The cooperative will be happy to discuss wholesale prices with stores and gift shops.

Trinity X NEWSLETTER July 30, 1967

A sense of pain and powerlessness affects us all in the wake of the recent rioting and killing in America's major cities. Let no one be mistaken that our Negro brothers are still second class citizens despite the efforts of civil rights leaders, some members of government, churchmen and other concerned citizens.
Chris Eckl, editor of the weekly Roman Catholic Georgia Bulletin, reminds us that:

> "Rioting makes many forget about this second-class citizenship. It makes us turn away from the reality that too many city officials in the nation have only paid lip service to equal housing and equal employment, and permits us to cry with moral indignation at those who disrupt the peace . . . But worst of all, rioting which is violent, dramatic, destructive, makes most of us look at the effects and not the causes. It is easy to condemn the effects, but it is difficult to erase the causes."

Pleading for an understanding of these causes and focusing his remarks on the sins of ommission by the centers of power Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr, placed part of the blame on an indifferent Congress. While he condemned the riots, Dr. King went on to say that "Congress has created the atmosphere for the riots by its defeat of such legislation as the rent-subsidy bill, the anit-rat bill and the model cities legislation."
Members of the Society are encouraged to examine the role played by their congressmen and senators on the above three measures and their action to date on the Civil Rights Act of 1967(S. 1026). Surely the actions of each one of these representatives should be wheighed on the scales of responsibility by concerned Churchmen the next time he comes before the electorate. - A.R.D.

VOTE TODAY

Please vote for the candidate of your choice in your Province and return the enclosed ballot(s) to Mrs. Aaron Oliver. Ballots must be received by the 26th of August and the winners will be announced in Seattle.

BISHOP CROWTHER DEPORTED

The Rt. Rev. Edward C. Crowther, Anglican Bishop of Kimberley and Kuruman, South Africa, has been deported because of his frequent and outspoken opposition to that country's policy of apartheid. Bp. Crowther intends to continue as "bishop in exile" and will aid his diocese by soliciting funds from overseas. Noting that his deportation was the "act of frightened men", Bp. Crowther went on to say that "it is not my elimination as a person that is South Africa's loss, but I believe that it is South Africa's loss that a voice of dissent and the right to speak boldly, must be stifled in a way which only manifests fear of the truth on the part of those silencing it."
Members of ESCRU are encouraged to suggest to their delegates to the General Convention that they plan to hear Bp. Crowther's sermon to the Society on Sunday, September the 17th at St. Paul's in Seattle. These delegates will be asked later during the Convention to express their opinion on a report to be made by Bp. Creighton and his committee regarding the investment of Church monies in South Africa.

WHEN WILL THEY EVER LEARN?

Staring at many parishioners these days, hopefully from the "most prominent bulletin board", is a promotional poster inviting Episcopalians to come to Seattle for the 62nd General Convention. The poster is headed: "WOULD YOU BELIEVE? YOU ARE INVITED!!" Those Churchmen who are not WASPS might sincerely doubt such an invitation, for in none of the seven "color" shots representing life in our convention city are any but Caucasians represented, Unfortunately, one discovers the same insensitivity within the pages of the convention's official Registration Handbook. At a time when industry, advertising, television, etc. are conscientiously working to reflect "all sorts and conditions of men" in their publications, it is doubly painful that we should once more find the Church marching in the rear of the ranks of progress.

"CHURCH" REPORT

A preliminary screening of 435 questionnaires returned to date yields the following results:

For the continuation of ESCRU	- 76%
For disbanding	- 6%
Don't know	- 7%
Not indicating a preference	- 11%

Recurring recommendations for greater involvement by the Society include poverty programs, ecumenical relations and the peace movement. A complete report on all the findings of this survey will be presented by John Church at the 7th Annual Meeting in Seattle.

CLERGY PLACEMENT

Fr. Robert Hood of Gary, Ind., assisted by fellow Board member Karl Nordling, has recently completed a major ESCRU Special Report entitled "The Placement and Deployment of Negro Clergy in the Episcopal Church." Citing a problem which "affects the image, the witness, the influence, and the very integrity of the Episcopal Church", Fr. Hood's report concludes with nineteen concrete recommendations which, if adopted and implemented, will do much to end this scandal within the household of faith. Every member of both the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies will be mailed a copy of this report prior to his departure for Seattle.

A CALL TO ACTION ON OFF-BASE HOUSING

In late June, Secretary McNamara ordered all segregated apartments and trailer courts within a 3½ mile radius of Andrews AFB, Md., off-limits to service personnel. However, it would be folly to let this matter stand. The Pentagon moved because it understood that the issue is a powerful one with Negro servicemen having their lives snuffed out in increasing numbers on the battlefield.

There is great danger that the use of the off-limits sanction may be left to local option as determined by the Pentagon's political strategists and PR men, in which case it will be used rarely if ever again. Mr. McNamara has already run into flack from some reactionaries and undoubtedly will be getting more from Southern congressmen. All of us can play a part in this struggle for open housing by sending letters to:

1. The Secretary of Defense, Washington, D.C. 20301 praising his action at Andrews AFB and urging that it be extended to cover all military bases.
2. The editor of your local newspaper saying the same thing, preferably signed with an organizational title.
3. Your - or any favorable - Congressman urging him to request extension of the order.

If you live near a military base, join with other interested groups and send a delegation to the commanding officer urging him to ask Mr. McNamara to issue a directive where voluntary attempts with local realtors have met with failure.

PROJECT TO INCREASE THE NUMBER OF NEGRO TEACHERS IN INDEPENDENT BOARDING SCHOOLS

ESCRU members Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Atmore, impressed with the importance of providing more Negro teachers for independent schools, are developing a project to achieve this goal privately with help from a foundation and participating schools. The project hopes to effect better communication between placement officers, organizations and individuals who know of interested teachers and schools. Further information on this project is available from the Atmores at their home, 125 North Elm Street, Wallingford, Conn., 06493. (After September 15, 1967 and until June 15, 1968 address inquires to the Atmores at 50 Riverside Dr., New York, N. Y. 10024.)

NEWARK RESPONDS TO CRISIS

Under the leadership of its Chmn., Fr. Ivan Backer, and Consultant to the Board, Mr. Frederick Sontag, the Newark Chapter has issued a report analyzing what the Episcopal Church "did and did not do during the recent riots" in that beleagured city. To make it more useful to other ESCRU members, the report has been divided into two parts: 1. A chronology of the events; 2. Some suggestions as to what might realistically be accomplished under similar circumstances. While the supply lasts, single copies are available from Mrs. Marion DeGroat, Newark ESCRU Chapter, 458 Harrison St., Passaic, N.J. 07055.

The Newark Chapter has also requested $5,000 from the Presiding Bishop to conduct an in-depth study of the events in Newark as well as the outbreaks in other cities. Through such analysis, the Chapter hopes to develop some new and more effective strategies for the Church to follow before, during and after such crises.

Finally, the Chapter has publicly challenged Gov. Hughes' hastily appointed "blue ribbon" investigating committee. Noting the "potential conflict of interest" of some appointees, the total absence of women or persons living in the inner-city and the lack of representation by anyone under 30 years of age. Chairman Backer called for the resignation of the present panel and urged the appointment of one which is truly representative.

Trinity V NEWSLETTER June 25, 1967

A MIMEOGRAPHED APPEAL

The return to a mimeographed format for our Newsletter reflects the financial crisis which continues to plague the Society. If the mailings have been fewer in recent months, the plain fact of the matter is that a limited staff and a limited budget require this of our stewardship. More distressing is the fact that the crucial Board of Directors Meeting-preceding our Annual Meeting and the General Convention in Seattle - whose major work will be to decide ESCRU's fate - may be without benefit of many of the insights of its gifted members simply because they do not possess the financial resources which will permit them to attend.

The Spring edition of the American Church News devotes a lengthy editorial to the current status of the Church's voluntary agencies and lists ESCRU as one of two "Religious Orders...confronted with crucial problems of financing." Pleading for more responsible stewardship by all Churchmen, the editorial goes on to make the following point:

> "If it is felt that a continuance of this type of witness is a healthy thing for the Church, then the individuals concerned must be prepared to make their decisions accordingly even if it means something slightly less for officials quotas in order to continue to strengthen the activities of the unofficial agencies which the individual believes are making real contributions to the life of the Church."

Some years ago, SCLC pleaded with women across the nation to forego the purchase of new hats for Easter and to send the money they would normally have spent to help pay for the birth of a Movement. The war in Viet Nam, white backlash, violence in the cities and the economic "realisties" of our nation have helped to betray that Movement to its Calvary. If ESCRU is to play any role in proclaiming its resurrection, its followers must also be willing to make sacrifices. Some members have already begun to give $5 or $10 above and beyond their annual dues. If all of us were "to go and do likewise", the Society would be able to continue in its role as Nathan to the Church's David. Otherwise, we must yield our mantle to a new Elisha and pray God that we have the vision to recognize and support the mission which he and his followers are called to lead. -A.R.D.

SAUL ALINSKY TO ADDRESS SOCIETY DINNER AT GENERAL CONVENTION

Mr. Saul D. Alinsky, Executive Director of the Industrial Areas Foundation, will speak at the dinner sponsored by ESCRU at the General Convention in Seattle on Friday night, September 15th, at St. Paul' Church. Churchmen who are not delegates to Convention, but who wish to attend the great opening service on Sunday evening, September 17th, can come for the Annual Meeting on the 15th, stay through the dinner with Mr. Alinsky on the 18th, and still have an opportunity to witness the opening highlights of a General Convention.

If you are planning to be with us in Seattle and have yet to make arrangements, write for the Registration Handbook which includes applications for housing and the ESCRU Dinner. You must have advance reservations for the latter as its early date precludes any cash sales at the ticket booth. Requests for handbook should be made to:

CHURCHWORKERS' WORKSHOP TO BACK ESCRU

The 16th Triennial Church Workers' Workshop, meeting in early June at St. Augustine's College in Raliegh, N.C., passed a resolution supporting ESCRU, encouraging its members to join, and encouraging its member clergy to make provision for the Society in their parish budgets. The CWW was created to articulate the needs, and sponsor the efforts, of churchmen who are Negro as they have sought to become fully included in the life of the Church. In a separate resolution, the CWW voted to direct its officers to meet with ESCRU Board and Staff in order to articulate the perceived needs of the Workshop and to implement strategy to achieve common goals.

TEAM MINISTRY ELECTS NICKERSON

Meeting in Atlanta in early June, the Team Ministry - an ecumenical program dedicated to reconciliation with major projects in Birmingham, Alabama, Jacksonville, Florida and Columbia, S.C. - elected Fr. David Nickerson to its five man steering committee.

PETITION'S PROGRESS

St. Thomas' Of Philadelphia, Pa., sparked by its Rector and Board Member, the Rev. Jesse Anderson, Sr., leads all other parishes to date by turning in a record 639 signatures for the petition to be presented in Seattle. Despite similar fine efforts by individuals and chapters, most notably those by Boston, Michigan, Pennsylvania, we are still short of our promised goal. If you have yet to circulate petitions in your area, please do so now. Perhaps including a reprint of the Living Church's supportive editorial(See our March Newsletter) will overcome resistance to some of the petition's wording. If you have made your drive, please mail us the results.

ESCRU SELF STUDY NEEDS YOU

At the request of the Presidentand Staff, Mr. John Church, former Vice-Chairman in Chicago, has devised the enclosed questionnaire as a supplement to a "data collector" recently sent out to Board Members, Chapter Chairman and 30 selected non-members. By analyzing the results of this survey, Mr. Church hopes to bring to the Board of Directors and the Annual Meeting an up-to-date reflection of your feelings about the Society together with the goals and priorities which you feel should guide ESCRU's future. Please put aside the time to make a thoughtful response to this request and return youranswers to the national office by the 21st. of July.

Concurrent with this effort, Bishop C. Kilmer Myers has agreed to convene a special study commission of national leaders to make an evaluation of ESCRU's present impact in the field, determine current needs, and develope a set of recommendations for future action.

SUPREME COURT RULES ON PIERSON vs. RAY

Though the AP news release made much of the fact that under this ruling "judges may not be sued for civil damages under an 1871 civil rights law," it also established the precedent that the intent of those arrested does not limit their right to sue for false arrest. This means that the Rev. Messrs. Breeden, Jones, Morris and Pierson, arrested in the Jackson,Miss., bus depot in 1961, now "have the right to sue the arresting police officers for damages."

TWO CHURCH SCHOOLS: COMMITMENT & CAUTION

The Virginia Episcopal School in Lynchburg, Va., has decided to accept one or more Negro students next Fall. Having benefited from its"christian" education, members of the Raliegh,N.C., Alumni Association sent a letter to the headmaster which read in part"

"...We want to make it crystal clear that we intend to make no future gift or soliciatation whatsoever to an integrated V.E.S."

The parents of one young alumnus have quite a different understanding of responsible stewardship:

"We have been interested in V.E.S. since..was a student there, and would have coveted for him then...an opportunity to know Negro contemporaries... or to be taught by qualified Negro teachers. We congratulate you and the Board of Trustees for adopting the policy...(are) enclosing a check in __'s name for the loyalty fund."

Another institution to watch in future months is St. Mary's Episcopal School in Memphis, Tenn. As part of their $400,000 Development Program, they received a gift of $25,000 from the Diocese of Tennessee. Just how the Diocese will use her "green power" has yet to be determined. We understand that some very creative approach are being considered. We pray that cautious consideration will be replaced by a bolder commitment so that the doors of St. Mary's are open, both to her students and faculty, to the extent that she may manifest her fidelity to her Lord and Ruler as well as to her region.

CHAPTER NEWS

BOSTON devoted its Annual Meeting and Dinner to a panel discussion on "Is there a role for the church-related civil rights organization? What is that role?" Speakers on the panel were Dr. Charles V. Willie of Harvard and ETS and former national president of ESCRU, The Rev. Joseph Pelham....CLEVELAND supported Public Conscience Sunday supporting welfare payments on the basis of 100% of the minimum health and decency standards....HOUSTON members, as part of the Diocese's Crisis Committee, given communications' assignments during the recent disturbances at TSU.... LOS ANGELES broadened its base of concern by using its April meeting to focus on the problems of the "invisible Mexican-American", a fast-growing community now numbering over ½ million in Los Angeles County....MARYLAND's Annual Dinner was addressed on the subject of "How to Humanize White People" by Bill Stringfellow....MICHIGAN represented ESCRU's GM proxies in questioning the company's cooperation with the apartheid government of South Africa....MINNESOTA has designated July 9th as "Petition Sunday" and has circularized every member and all clergy in the Diocese with an explanation of the petition's rationale and goals. Both national ESCRU and the local Twin Cities' Opportunities Industrialization Center received checks for $700 as a result of the Chapter's highly successful "Evening with Malcolm Boyd"....NEW JERSEY Chairman Oscar Barker led a ten-man delegation to the recent Kodak stockholders' meeting in Flemington, N.J. where they were joined by members of the NEWARK Chapter. Mr. Benjamin Wright represented Newark's proxies. Though the June edition of the Episcopalian carries a picture of Mr. Wright and identifies him as a member of the Society, not one word of the text of its article gives a hint that students at ETS, ESCRU and many other concerned Episcopalians had committed themselves to this issue well in advance of the Presiding Bishop's decision to withold the Church's proxies ....PENNSYLVANIA, fearing that a Charter ammendment aimed at increasing the borrowing power of the Philadelphia School Board without voter approval and whose end result would not be an attack on the problem of racial and class segregation but rather its perpetuation, joined with the Philadelphia Urban League in urging "its members and other citizens to vote against the Amendment and to urge the Board of Education to develop a new Capital Program which is part of a comprehensive plan to provide quality education for all children.

ANDERSON IS NEW PRESIDENT

The Rev. Jesse F. Anderson was elected by the Board of Directors to be the Society's new President for the coming year. His predecessor, Mike Peabody, was applauded by the Annual Meeting for his faithful service during the past two years. He will remain as a consultant to the Board.

Other officers elected were: The Rev. Earl Neil, Vice President; Mrs. Van R. Viebig, Jr., Secretary; Mrs. Donald S. Brey, Treasurer.

The eight Directors elected from the Provinces by the mail ballot are: Rushing, Sontag, Rollins, Ford, Burt, Smith, Viebig and Lynberg. Elected from the floor by the Annual Meeting are Ferrell, Myers, Pelham and Putnam. These newly-elected Directors will serve two-year terms.

HOOD REPORT ON CLERGY PLACEMENT NOW AVAILABLE

Fr. Hood's twenty-eight page report on "The Placement and Deployment of Negro Clergy in the Episcopal Church" is now available from the national office at 50¢ per copy. ESCRU members will want to read this report as well as that submitted by Bp. Hall's committee at Seattle with an eye towards its implementation in their own dioceses.

BOARD ACCEPTS MORRIS RESIGNATION

After seven years of dedicated and inspired leadership, the Rev. John Morris has made final his decision to resign as ESCRU's Executive Director. The Board of Directors reluctantly accepted his decision. Commenting on John's contributions to the Society, Bp. Myers noted:

> "Someone has said that most great institutions are the lengthened shadow of a man; and the role of John Morris in the life of ESCRU can not be overstated. From its inception until now, he has shaped the organization according to his understanding of what its role should be - and we have been glad that it was his hand that was at the helm."

Following the acceptance of Fr. Morris' resignation, the Board appointed Kim Dreisbach as "Acting Director" and created a Personnel Study Committee to "examine candidates and present to the Board a recommendation for Executive Director." This committee is chaired by the Rev. Joseph A. Pelham and includes Mary Eunice Oliver, Bp. Paul Moore and Bp. Myers. It was further agreed that the committee would report its selection to the Board by December the 15th.

ESCRU DELEGATES DELIVER AT CONVENTION

The difference in tone between the St. Louis Convention and the one just concluded at Seattle could not be better illustrated than by listing ESCRU-endorsed measures which passed the Seattle Convention. Seattle was as liberal as St. Louis was conservative; and the actions of the Annual Meeting in endorsing measures to come before the Convention were vindicated on the convention floor itself. Measures in which ESCRU interested itself, and the results of the voting on these, included the following; 1) the ESCRU Petition(cast in more succinct language and supported by the 10,000 signatures which were delivered to the committee)passed; 2) the Presiding Bishop's budget for urban work, passed; 3) acceptance of the "Bayne Report" calling for a less rigid definition of heresy, passed; 4) resolution calling for an end to the hostilities in Vietnam; amended, emasculated to some degree, but passed; 5) memorial resolution for Jonathan Daniels, passed (by rising vote, and a further resolution asking for propers and a Prayer Book day for Jon was referred to the Prayer Book Committee and ultimately to the Standing Liturgical Commission; 6) admission of women as deputies, passed; 7) resolution authorizing COCU representatives to begin construction of a specific plan, passed(with an amendment forbidding them to negotiate ECUSA's entry thereinto); 8) resolution forbidding discrimination in labor unions, passed(and a resolution calling for the extension of all federal labor union legislation to the field of farm labor, endorsed by ESCRU as a separate matter was incorporated into the same resolution and also passed); 9) resolution calling for study in the field of humanly-sexuallity, and for recognition that morality and legality are not necessarily the same thing, passed; 10) resolution in favor of trial use of the proposed liturgy, passed; 11) resolution calling for more frequent conventions, accepted in principle when the House of Deputies joined the House of Bishops in asking the PB to call a special convention two years hence to deal with, among other things, this question. This of course, requires constitutional changes; 12) resolution calling for proportional representation in the House of Deputies, lost.

In addition to these measures, ESCRU candidates ran well in several elections, the most exciting being a "cliff-hanger" in which Dr. Charles Lawrence of New York came within 20 votes of winning the vice-presidency of the House of Deputies. Fr. Paul Washington ran fourth in a field of nine for the presidency and Charles Willie was re-elected by acclamation to the Executive Council.

There were 76 ESCRU members in the House of Deputies this time. Much of the floor work for ESCRU-sponsored measures and candidates was carried on by ESCRU deputies Ed Morgan or Arizona, Paul Washington of Penna. Charles Lawrence of New York, Carl Gerdau of N. Michigan, Sol Jacobs of Ohio, Joe Pelham of Michigan(who presented the ESCRU petition), John Church of Chicago, Dick Byfield of California, and several others.

R.B.

ST. LOUIS vs. SEATTLE: A DIFFERENT UNDERSTANDING OF TACTICS

Following the arrest of Fr. Walter Witte, who with others was protesting the use of Kiel Auditorium for a segregated debutantes' ball, Bp. Cadigan has written letters to Fr. Witte and his assistant, the Rev. William Matheus, requesting their resignations from St. Stephen's Church.

Parishioners of St. Stephen's have sent a letter to Bp. Cadigan which reads in part:

"Our two pastors...have given us-over the past years-the leadership, love and loyalty which have provided us with the strength to remain steadfast in our loyalty to Jesus Christ.. ..Having now learned that you desire their departure...,we are both desolate and dumbfounded. Is it, dear Bishop, that our desires-our own knowledge of what is good for us-is not the power of money to back up our wishes."

Referring to the program adopted by the 62nd Gen. Convention, Bp. Hines stated: "Among its aims will be the bringing of people in the ghettoes into areas of decision making by which their destiny is influenced." In St. Louis the decision was to protest a ball. Will the Church really "Let the people decide" or will it continue to approve only those strategies pleasing to the affluent and not to the afflicted?

WASHINGTON LENDS SUPPORT TO MILWAUKEE ESCRU: BACKS NAACP YOUTH COUNCIL AND FATHER GROPPI

On September the 29th both the Greater Washington and Milwaukee Chapters joined other concerned groups in their respective cities in a Prayer Vigil Service for a fair housing ordinance for the city of Milwaukee. Those participating in the nation's capitol gathered at the Washington Monument while those making their witness in Milwaukee prayed at St. Boniface's Catholic Church.

Acting Director Dreisbach flew to Milwaukee to meet with leaders of the NAACP Youth Council and the Chapter. ESCRU was well represented in the council's daily marches as Frs. William Wendt and Quinland Gordon joined the marches with a strong contingent from the Chicago Chapter lead by Mattie Hopkins, Octavia Miles and Jean Frey.

Bishop Donald Hallock has moved for greater involvement for the Diocese in this crisis by creating a new position of Metropolitan Minister. ESCRU member Fr. James Caldwell has been called to this new post.

NOTE: Copies of an excellent cartoon depicting three soldiers resting from battle and captioned "I'm sorry you're so upset about Negroes moving in next door. My Negro neighbors saved my life yesterday." are available from the Missouri Commission on Human Rights, 314 East High St., Jefferson City, Mo. 65101.

CHURCH CLUB OF PHILADELPHIA RESPONDS TO CHAPTER'S REQUEST - CHANGES SITE OF BISHOP PIKE'S ADDRESS

Responding to a request initiated by Chairman Barbara Rollins of the Pennsylvania Chapter, the President of the Church Club of Philadelphia informed ESCRU that its October Reception and Dinner has been shifted from the Union League (a private club which discriminates in its membership policy) to the Holiday Inn. Ironically enough, the speaker for the evening, the Rt. Rev. James A. Pike, plans to entitle his address "Relevance, Credibility and Performance in the Church Today."

National ESCRU joins the Pennsylvania Chapter in applauding Mr. Crampton and the Church Club for their sensitivity and forthright action in this matter.

DR. KING AGAIN SLIGHTED BY EPISCOPALIANS

Having endured the pain of his son's rejection by a then Church-related secondary school, Nobel prize winner Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. finds himself again the victim of the Church's cowardice - this time at the hands of the General Theological Seminary.

Dr. King's name is conspicuously absent - as is that of any other black leader of the Church - from a group of distinguished leaders scheduled to receive honoray doctorates at the Sesquicentenniel of GTS scheduled for Wednesday, November the 8th. Leaders like the Most Rev. Archbishop Iakovos and R. Eugene Carson Blake who shared the dust of Selma's streets with Dr. King will be denied the opportunity to share a well-deserved honor on that day.

ESCRU recently learned that Dr. King's name had originally been presented as a candidate for such an honor, but that GTS' five-man Committee on Education had rejected him because of his "controversial" image as a militant leader in the struggle for human dignity.

No doubt the seminary will try to save face by offering the lame excuse that this particular convocation was created to honor those churchmen primarily known for their leadership in ecumenical relations. We believe that the incarnational manifestation of the ecumenical movement - at least during the last decade in the U.S. - has been the Civil Rights Movement of which Dr. King is the undesputed spiritual leader. We further believe that Dr. King is one of the most functional ecumenists in the world today, and that many lapsed christians owe their return to the faith of their fathers to the relevance and heroism inspired in them by Dr. King. To have excluded him from this honor is at best a glaring sin of omission; at worst it again reveals the Church as a faithless coward.

Racism In Church Charged By ESCRU

Over ten thousand Episcopalians have signed a "Declaration and Petition" sponsored by ESCRU, to the 62nd General Convention charging the Church with "heretical and blasphemous distortion of the Christian doctrine of man." The petition specifically cites the tradition of segregated clergy placement, failure at Christian education efforts, discrimination in the Church's financial investments, building and purchasing policies.

The result of this "racism at the very heart of the Church's life," they say, is "an inability to address its mission to the crucial issues in the life of the country." The petition calls for repentence on the part of the Church and asks for a Council of Renewal, urging a program and a budget which will acknowledge this repentance and renewal.

Signatures to the petition came from 66 dioceses, 44 states and seven foreign countries.

Fifty-five bishops, 54 clerical deputies and 22 lay deputies are members of the Epsicopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity. ESCRU has a total membership of 5,119.

Deputies Still Lily White

The Rev. Jesse Anderson, a Philadelphia priest newly elected as president of ESCRU, pointed out that of 678 members in the House of Deputies "only 8 are black." He remarked however that this lily white ratio is a record, since the number of Negroes in theHouse of Deputies since 1928 has been, when there have been any at all, a series reading 1-3-5-5-7- until this year, when 8 are present.

Saul Alinsky at the Annual Banquet of ESCRU

THE DAILY

September 19, 1967

"If the Episcopal Church wants to be a church it has got to act, to support Bishop Hines, or it will be an artifact, a museum piece within fifteen years. Parts of it look like that already."

This is the opinion of Saul Alinsky, nationally prominent consultant in community organization, on the Presiding Bishop's urging of immediate financial aid for the inner-city crisis.

Alinsky's opinion of Rap Brown, SNCC leader known for a diametrically opposite solution to inner city problems; is that Brown's statements have not been constructive in any way to date.

"While his thinking expresses the anger, frustration, and bitterness of the ghettos there hasn't been anything constructive. It's one thing to talk, another to act."

"Brown doesn't face danger from indictment for crossing state lines; that would only make him a martyr. His only danger would come from a sanity hearing."

The double-take wit of that comment seems to be a characteristic of Alinsky, who displays a freedom possible to few men. Jewish himself, he operates on the battle line of the "other America," the under-educated, under-housed, and under employed, in the inner cities of the United States.

Whenever a group of churches can pool sufficient funds to set up a program in an inner-city situation and the group they wish to help also invites him in he will go. His task force is the Industrial Areas Foundation, successful in contacting, motivating, and organizing constructively the "other America."

Asking Martyrdom

He is watching General Convention's reaction to their Presiding Bishop's address.

"Bishop Hines has introduced a Christian doctrine in the House of Bishops," says Alinsky. That's asking for martyrdom. He is asking for action. That is committing heresy. He is asking them to take action in their own dioceses. That is horrendous. He wants them to behave not like Bishops but like priests. Bishops are supposed to forget how to be a priest."

Four Negroes To Be Seeking Church Posts

The Episcopal Society for Racial and Cultural Unity plans to nominate four Negro churchmen for the Episcopal Church's top administrative body, the Executive Council.

ESCRU has been holding meetings in connection with the general council. The organization has charged that the Episcopal Church has discriminated against its Negro priests in job placement.

The proposed nominees are the Rev. Jesse Anderson, Sr., Philadelphia, president of ESCRU; the Rev. Albin Ferrel, chaplain at Howard University; J. Herbert Tate, Newark, N. J. attorney, and Dr. Charles Lawrence, Pomona, N. Y.

AFRICA ANOTHER VIETNAM?

"A second Vietnam is brewing in South Africa and the United States will be on the wrong side when it blows up," according to the Rt. Rev. Edward Crowther, exiled Bishop of the Diocese of Kimberley.

In an address at St. Paul's Church, Bishop Crowther said the United States is getting "short term capital gains on its investments there which will lead to long term political involvement in protection of assets, so placing it on the wrong side."

Calling upon the Episcopal Church to "sacrifice her status-ridden professional institutionalism and recreate her priorities," particularly in matters of finance, the Bishop urged the withdrawal of investments which support South Africa's policy of apartheid. He cited economic participation in the profits of apartheid as inexcusable and lamented that a special report to be presented to the Convention by the Bishop of Washington, D.C., will fail to recommend such withdrawal.

Bishop Crowther further urged economic sanctions against South Africa by the United States with the recommendation that churches exert maximum pressure upon the government to take such actions.

Moving again to the Church, the Bishop called for the development of a "theology of revolution." "We are involved," he said, "in South Africa and South America, in situations which cannot continue peacefully indefinitely. At what point, if at all, we support violence in a situation in which there would appear to be no hope of peaceful redress of intolerable grievances is open to question," he concluded.

Racial-Unity Group to Keep Watch Over Episcopal Action

The Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity today assumed a "watchdog" role on proposals to divert church funds for the support of political and economic programs of black people.

The Rt. Rev. C. Kilmer Myers, bishop of California (San Francisco), a member of the executive board, praised the Rt. Rev. John E. Hines, presiding bishop, for his proposal to spend church money on "responsible black power."

But he added:

"It is highly likely the program will be defeated in the convention or if it should pass it could be emasculated."

Bishop Myers, successor to Bishop James A. Pike, is one of several bishops in the controversial society, which is committed militantly to racial causes.

The society has about 5,000 members, but Bishop Meyers says the society is one of the church's most significant organizations. He said some 100 members of the society are here as voting delegates in the General Convention.

BISHOP MYERS said the society will do all the "lobbying" it can do to pass the presiding bishop's program.

The bishop said the society has a "suspicious attitude," particularly among its Negro members, who feel the program "may be simply verbiage."

If the convention does not deliver on the program, the bishop said there likely will be "direct action" against the convention. What form it will take, he did not speculate.

Bishop Myers said the society also was going ahead with plans to present a petition containing more than 10,000 signatures which, in effect, accuses the church with "heretical and blasphemous distortion of the Christian doctrine of man" in regard to its treatment of Negroes.

THE SOCIETY has said Negro priests are discriminated against in placements in churches and other church positions.

Bishop Myers said "the church ought to be concerned about the real heresy (racism) rather than tying itself in theological knots over Bishop Pike."

Pike has been accused of heresy in his challenge of doctrines and creedal statements.

"We are looking for a dramatic way to present our own heresy charges against the church," the bishop declared.

THE BISHOP warned that the estrangement between white people and blacks is widening in this country, particularly in a number of the old-line civil-rights organizations.

"I recognize ESCRU as one of the last civil-rights organizations for dialog to go on between blacks and whites," he said.

If the convention fails "to deal honestly with the racial situation," the Episcopal Church will become just another part of the fabric of the white backlash, Bishop Myers said.

The society yesterday elected the Rev. Jesse Anderson, a Negro priest from Philadelphia, as president. He succeeds Malcolm E. Peabody, Jr., Cambridge, Mass., member of a well-known Episcopal family.

Negro Nominations Is An Act Of Self Determination

A significant indication that Deputies have been moved by the extraordinary sermon Bishop Hines delivered on Sunday is the willingness of many to seriously consider Negroes for key slots in upcoming election, including the vice-presidency, the Executive Council, the Church Pension Fund (where no Negro has ever been considered), and for the Trustees to General Seminary.

Furthermore, there is a growing appreciation, also stimulated by the Presiding Bishop's sermon, that the way that Negro candidates are selected is fully as important and perhaps more so, than the elections themselves.

Past custom, when selecting minority candidates for office, not only in the Church, but in the U.S. generally, has been for white leadership to select the person they thought most qualified and the one who would most appeal to white voters.

It is becoming clear, however, that this method vitiates Negro self-respect, since by the process Negroes are denied the right to choose their own leadership and, more importantly, if the person designated is elected, there is little guarantee that he will be sensitive to the needs of other Negroes, since he owes his election to the "white power structure."

ISSUES

Segregation Incident May Prove Providential

Negro Churchmen of one Diocese found, it necessary to refuse to attend a party given for their delegation held in a local club which does not accept Negro membership and does not normally serve Negroes—even as guests.

It is astonishing that, in the context of this Convention which has focused so strongly on the racial crisis in our cities, such action should have been necessary.

The incident, however, may be providential if it serves to remind us that even a $3,000,000 commitment to the ghetto will not remove the necessity for extensive reformation in the life of the Church itself.

More immediately, it underlines the importance of authorizing the Christian Social Relations Department to make sure that such possibilities of discrimination in the host city of a General Convention are investigated and removed long before the Convention meets.

10,000 Sign Plea On Race

A resolution bearing 10,000 names was submitted yesterday to the House of Deputies calling for "repentance" and "a declaration of intention" to eliminate racial separation within the Church.

The document, also urging that the Church strengthen its witness in behalf of racial equality, was referred to the house's Committee on Christian Social Relations for study and recommendation. Action, if any, on the resolution will come later in the week.

Introduced by the Rev. Joseph A. Pelham of the Diocese of Michigan, the resolution reads as follows:

"WHEREAS more than 10,000 members of the Episcopal Church have petitioned the 62nd General Convention of the Church asking this Convention to join in common repentance over the continuing existence of racial discrimination and separation within the life of the Church, and over its failure to address itself fully to the existence and manifestation of racism in the life of the nation, said petition, attached hereto and made a part hereof, as though set out in full, and

"WHEREAS these members of the church have likewise petitioned this Convention to exercise such leadership as will point the way toward the elimination of racial separation in the Church and the strengthening of its witness for an inclusive society, and

"WHEREAS these petitioners have requested us to support the Bishops of the Church who have proposed a Council for the renewing of the Church in our day, to the end that both its inner life and its mission to the world may more effectively fulfill our Lord's wish "that they all may be one," and

"WHEREAS the Presiding Bishop has sounded a clear call to this Convention to address itself to the problems of the urban crisis in America which have their root in the persistence of racism,

"THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that this House acknowledge receipt of these petitions with their call for common repentance and declaration of intention and take seriously to heart the summons which they contain, and

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that this House join with these 10,000 members of the Church who have called for a Council of Renewal which will have as one of its major terms of concern the existence of racism in Church and Society."

Debate Returns To Bishops

BY Frederick H. Sontag

Conscientious objectors' problems and selective objection to war developed interesting, sharp debate among the Bishops as the Viet Nam war touched their nerves and brought out into the open the most important international question facing the Church.

The CO statement was passed with some changes, while the selective war objection was refered back to committee, for possible rewriting or no further action. Some Bishops felt yesterday that the subject of Viet Nam had now been disposed of, and would not come up again, while others understood that it would recur in a separate statement either from Bishops or Deputies.

Bishop Burt of Ohio presided as the Bishop of SC urged the elimination of clergy exemptions from the draft.

Bishop Myers said flatly that international laws were being violated in Viet Nam. He cited a position paper prepared by "Layman and Clergy concerned about Viet Nam" at the Columbia University Law School, which he had read in proof form.

The Bishop of North Carolina charged that no one knew the exact number of CO's in the Episcopal Church and that this data ought to be available for the debate. Bishop Brady said that he had had dinner with Billy Graham after his Saigon visit, and that only three men in the U. S. have the answer for Viet Nam. He warned that if the Selective Objection statement was passed it would be "a right to anarchy". The Bishop of Alabama said the men of Viet Nam understand, and appreciate why they are there, but it is the young people in the U. S. who are confused. Bishop Pike, whose remarks were so applauded, that the PB urged the gallery to stop, made a lengthy legal presentation. He said in his 75 college visits he had not found any cowards, just young Americans who did not want to kill in Viet Nam. Bishop Cole of CNY spoke on behalf of the selective objection resolution reminding the Bishops forcefully that just recently a young man had come before the House, urging that the Church speak up on this and related issues. Bishop Cole said the Bishops had a responsibility to speak up. "The stronger we say it, the better", Bishop Cole said movingly, "that is if we heard the young people."

The Bishop of Lexington agreed with Bishop Brady about anarchy, and he did not wish to underwrite it.

In a most forceful personal statement of conscience, Bishop Gordon of Alaska said that he would not go to Viet Nam now if asked to do so, and he expected his Church to stand behind him. He said it was just wrong to fight in Viet Nam. Bishop Gordon also said his 21 year old son was not facing the same problem, and if he agreed with his father, he also would expect his Church to stand behind him. The Bishop said "both expected to take the consequences in alternate service".

Bishop Crittenden admitted that he had changed his mind on this subject during recent months, and now favored the resolution and opposed the Viet Nam war. He described moral and theological reasoning behind this. He forcefully charged that the Episcopal Church must handle and face up to the "just war" theory. He tried to explain how the Church had gotten away from automatically endorsing "a just war", but had not yet gone to an alternative statement. He urged support for those who like Bishop Gordon would be thought of as involved in an act of civil disobedience.

Episcopalian Urban-Crisis Plan Encounters First Opposition

By LANE SMITH and MIKE WYNE

The first open opposition to the $3 million urban-crisis fund recommended by the presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church developed in the wake of an open hearing Wednesday.

At the hearing called to solicit opinions on the church's proposed $14.6 million budget for 1968, several speakers indicated reservations about using church funds for nonchurch causes.

The church's General Convention will act on the budget later.

The Rt. Rev. John E. Hines, presiding bishop, has asked the church to contribute $3 million annually to Negro community organizations planning their own programs for economic and political power.

The Rt. Rev. Frederick J. Warnecke, head of the Program and Budget Committee, said funds for other programs, principally for the aged and alcohol-problems ministeries, have been redirected to the proposed urban-crisis fund.

The fund also would draw on "new money" and a gift from the women's organizations.

"WHY SHOULD THE church put money into poverty projects when there are federal projects covering the same ground?" the Rev. James Brice Clark, Nebraska, asked. He was critical of proposed program cutbacks.

The Rt. Rev. Gray Temple, bishop of South Carolina, warned the committee that many urban programs have been misrepresented as "Rap Brown" types of black power.

The Ven. Walter W. Hannum, archdeacon of Alaska, objected to cutting back the alcohol-problems program.

"YOU GET A VERY little program for a lot of cost," said Bishop Warnecke, of Bethlehem, Pa.

"A person can't possibly attack the urban crisis without handling alcoholism and addiction and other things."

The Rev. Jesse Anderson, Philadelphia, new president of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, criticized the committee for having no Negroes. He also asked:

"How will you implement the program (urban crisis) in a predominantly white and increasingly racist church?"

The Rev. Albion Ferrell, chaplain of Howard University, Washington, D. C., a pioneer Negro institution, urged that the budget be supported in full, "so that there indeed be a hearing whether we agree or not."

Black Power Chairman Warns P.B.

The Rev. Nathan Wright, Jr., chairman of the recent Newark "Black Power" Conference, in a circular letter to the Negro clergy of the Episcopal Church dated September 14, called for "appropriate and responsible support" for the "clearly gracious intentions of Bishop Hines," but issued several warnings about the implementation of the proposed expenditures for Black community needs.

"The Black clergy of our Church must be at the center of any endeavor by the Church to deal with the needs of Black people," he went on. "For the Church, even unintentionally, to overlook the resources (of the black clergy) would be a perpetuation of the insolence and paternalism which has been heaped upon the black clergy in the past. . . We can as Black Episcopal clergy in our communities serve as the primary agents for the creation of the Black unity needed for our survival and for the nation's internal peace and orderly growth."

Dr. Wright wrote that "we must see as on our side all those who raise thoughtful questions about '815'. . . and that "the capable white staff of the Urban Department should long have been seen as an inappropriate instrument for relating to either Black distress or Black mission. We should ask for immediate staff re-adjustment."

Christmastide NEWSLETTER December 15, 1967

A LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT

"The more I work with people in attempting to relate the Church to the world, the more I am convinced of the urgent need for a strong ESCRU. We are in the midst of a most peculiar sort of social revolution which is simultaneously subtle, difficult to analyze, and yet the most important reality of this decade. For too long, only the Negroes in America knew that they were in the revolution, but now other segments within the nation have awakened to the fact that they and their very future is involved whether they want to be or not. As examples, note the hippies, unrest on the campuses, Vietnam and draft demonstrations and the voice of the poor for self-determination. Sooner or later, the white poor who comprise two-third's of this nation's poverty population will also join this revolution. Already this group has begun its first protest feeling that the ameliorative effects of governmental programs have been realized only in the Negro community. We will be in serious trouble when this group fully awakens, for the American white man has a history of fundamental violence in changing social and political patterns (e.g. the American Revolution, the Civil War, our relations with Indians and Mexicans and the history of lynching, raping and general mayhemperpetrated on Negroes both in the North and in the South).

The Church should be one element - preferably in a coalition with industry, government and education - to take a stand for justice in these troubled times. But, the Church's structure will not permit her to make a valid witness; even one or two strong Dioceses and Bishops cannot witness for the whole Church. One reason for the Church's failure is that most of her members have not progressed beyond the 'high-chair Gospel.' You can imagine my sadness when, after meeting with some of the finest men in my own Diocese regarding a recent crisis, one of our clergy said to me: 'What are you going to do? It is if they have pulled a curtain before the eyes of their souls. No matter how much you show, they cannot see!' The affluent and powerful are so engrossed in keeping the peace and maintaining the status quo, in stressing the absoluteness of the Law at the expense of Justice, that in their blindness they will pull down the very walls around their heads. There is one hope: God willing, people like the dissatisfied collegians, the war protestors and the Peace Corps volunteers and groups like ESCRU, NCCIJ and PIC who stand outside the established structures in order to absorb the truth of the Gospel more fully - it will be people like these who help to reshape America's history so that the beautiful precepts of liberty and justice proclaimed in our Constitution can become the realities which are actually practiced in our national life. If you could but see it from your writer's view, you too would realize how essential a strong, active and Christ-inspired ESCRU is, not only to the lives of its members, but to the entire Episcopal Church.

In trying to become faithful and effective, your Board has found it necessary to make certain changes in the structure and direction of the Society. 1968 will find us moving towards new goals and adopting a more relevant Statement of Purpose. At our recent meeting in Detroit, the Board and the Personnel Committee were convinced that black leadership was essential for the trying days ahead. On the other hand, recognizing the skills of our Acting Director, we felt it incumbent not to lose his expertise during this period of transposition. So, the decision was made to "opt" for a two-man staff with the hope our members will take it upon themselves to meet the consequent financial burden. Kim Dreisbach has agreed with this plan and will remain as Associate Director while we proceed with our search for a new Executive Director.

I believe that there are available enough interested people and money, if we will but assume the responsibility to interest them. to make this plan feasible. Along with my best wishes to you and your families at Christmastide, I make an earnest request that we all bestir ourselves so that ESCRU may do the Lord's work more adequately in these fields of the Gospel which He has placed in our hands, implanted in our minds and laid upon our hearts.

Very sincerely yours,
The Rev. Jesse F. Anderson, S.T.D.

THE JON DANIELS STORY

The Seabury Press has recently published The Jon Daniels Story with his letters and papers. The book is available in paperback @ $1.95 and is edited by Jon's close friend and co-worker, William J. Schneider, Episcopal Chaplain at Harvard and Radcliffe. All proceeds from the sale of this book will go to the Jonathan Myrick Daniels Fellowship Fund at E.T.S. as suggested by Mrs. Daniels. This fund was established by the school's trustees to provide financial assistance to seminarians undertaking to strengthen their theological education through participation in social movements.

BOARD SETS NEW DUES RATES

At its recent meeting in Detroit, the Society's Board of Directors adopted the following recommendations for dues effective January 1, 1968:

Students and seminarians	- $2.50
Single membership	- $5.00
Couple membership	- $8.00
Contributing membership	- $25.00
Supporting membership	- $50.00

In a Newsletter which is admittedly heavy with requests for financial support, maybe we can all learn a lesson from the "wise men" of the first Christmas story who acknowledged the birth of a new age for all mankind with their gifts.

CHICAGO TO HONOR JOHN MORRIS WITH THE LICHTENBERGER AWARD

Chicago ESCRU has scheduled January 26-28 for a Black Power Workshop which will conclude with a banquet at which time the Rev. John B. Morris will be presented with the Bishop Lichtenberger Human Rights Award in recognition and gratitude for his many contributions during the past eight years as ESCRU's Executive Director. In order to make it possible for all members of the Society to express their appreciation to John, invitations to the banquet will be mailed to the entire membership. Those who because of distance are unable to attend will be encouraged to purchase banquet tickets, the proceeds of which will be donated to National ESCRU in John's name. Members who make such contributions will have their names entered on a scroll which will be presented to Fr. Morris at the banquet. Persons who are fortunate enough to attend the workshop and banquet will have an opportunity to hear Dr.Nathan Wright, Convener of the National Conference on Black Power held in Newark, New Jersey, this past summer, and from Dr. Charles Hamilton, co-auther with Stokley Carmichael of Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America and Chairman of the Department of Sociology at Roosevelt University.

All reservations for the workshop and the banquet should be sent to:

The registration fee for the workshop alone is $10 and overnight accomodations ($16-double;$12-single) are available at the University of Chicago's Center for Continuing Education. The cost of the dinner along is $12.50.

ESCRU joins with many others in expressing our sympathy to the family and friends of Fr. William B. Parsons, Jr. who died on Nov. 17, 1967 following emergency brain surgery. Bill was last with us in Seattle where he served as a process observor and as a witness to commitment with compassion which will continue to inspire all of us who had the good fortune to know him.

NEW RELATIONSHIP IN ST. LOUIS

Following an all day and night session of negotiations between representatives of the Diocese and an ad hoc ecumenical Committee of Concern for Clergy Freedom chaired by the Rev. Roger A. Harless, Ex. Sect'y of the Presbyterian Interracial Council(PIC), Bp. George L. Cadigan of Missouri announced that Fr. Walter Witte and the Rev. William Matheus will be permitted to continue in their ministry to St. Stephen's. The Bishop's statement said in part:"The clergy of St. Stephen's and I have met for several hours of discussion and negotiation this week. We have entered open and honest confrontation of issues which have divided us. We have reached understandings whereby we expect a new working relationship is possible."

Both Bp. Cadigan and the Rev. Messrs. Witte and Matheus have expressed their appreciation to Acting Director Dreisbach who spent four days in St. Louis with all parties to effect a settlement.

CONSULTATION ON RACISM PLANNED BY MID-ATLANTIC CHAPTERS

January 12th & 13th will find the Pennsylvania Chapter playing host to about 40 members drawn from Newark to Baltimore for a Consultation on Racism to be led by the Rev. Frank Joyce, Ex. Sect'y of PAR (People Against Racism) in Detroit and Fr. David Gracie, formerly of Detroit and now an Urban Missioner in Philadelphia. This conference is designed "to train persons in the process of analyzing the depths of racism in American life, including the Church and our own members, and to equip them with the skills and techniques for attacking this cancer in their respective parishes and cemmunities."

This consultation is in the nature of a pilot project requested by our Board of Directors. Two competent observers will be used to evaluate the conference, and it is hoped that as a result a blueprint will be drafted which can be used for similar training sessions in other regions and Chapters.

PASSION SUNDAY NEWSLETTER MARCH 31, 1968

NEW STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

Following its initial conception at the Society's 7th Annual Meeting in Sept., our new and revised Statement of Purpose went to the printer's one week before the release of the Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders and is included as one of three enclosures with this edition of the Newsletter. Both documents conclude that the core of this nation's crippling malignancy can be traced to its white racism and that the focus of our efforts must lie in a drastic reshaping of white attitudes and actions.

The Rt. Rev. Anson P. Stokes,Jr., ESCRU member and Chairman of the Commission on Church and Race of the Massachusetts Council of Churches, is urging Churchmen to take "as required reading for Lent" the Report of the President's Commission. Certainly all ESCRU members will want to undertake this discipline and use the knowledge thereby gained to educate their fellow parishioners about the depth and urgency of the crisis which we all face. The new Statement of Purpose provides an opportunity for us to enlighten previously uninformed Churchmen about the past accomplishments and future goals of ESCRU and to give them an opportunity to join the Society which has done so much to bring the Episcopal Church to its present position of involvement in the continuing struggle for Justice, Power and Dignity inspired by Love for "all sorts and conditions of men." A.R.D.

POOR PEOPLE'S CAMPAIGN

Sunday, April the 21st, has been selected as the target date for massive distribution of the enclosed fliers and information sheets in America's churches. ESCRU members in Boston and Milwaukee will witness the gathering of the initial groups going to Washington,D.C., while those who live in Baltimore and Alexandria,Virginia, will be in a position to provide support and services to the campaign during the final staging of the marchers prior to their confrontation with Congress and selected Federal agencies. The viability of non-violence is on trial in this campaign; if it fails, it will be the soul of the nation which will be revealed as its "poorest" resource.

TEXT OF THE BISHOP LITCHTENBERGER HUMAN RIGHTS AWARD PRESENTED ON JANUARY 28,1968 TO THE REV. JOHN B. MORRIS

"We salute you, John Morris,
As a man who was forthright and honest when it would have been easier to be hostile and sly,
As a brother who was tireless in his struggle against discrimination and injustice when it would have been easier to to stand in the shadows of anonymity,
As a Priest who chose the more difficult course of striving to remove cause rather than teach people to endure their suffering,
As a friend who spoke out when silence would have been the course that prudence dictated,
As a defender who routed his enemies in confusion because of his steadfastness.
And so he stands with those of our times who stood for the right, putting to silence the ignorance of foolish men and with impatient confidence awaiting manifestations of the sons of God."

NCNC: THEOLOGICAL DIALOGUE

The National Committee of Negro Churchmen formed a Committee on Theological Dialogue to consider some of the following questions:

1. What are the theological implications attendant upon the creation... of a self-conscious national movement of black churchmen?
2. Is it possible and desirable for the NCNC to formulate a kind of "Barmen Declaration" for black churchmen who see themselves in somewhat the same relationship to white racism in America that the Confessional Churchmen in Germany saw themselves in relationship to National Socialism?
4. How does the doctrine of the suffering servant relate to the necessary acquisition of power by suffering, powerless people?
5. What would be an acceptable theological analysis of power and love as thoughly coherent and dialectical elements of a true doctrine of reconciliation?
6. If God acts in history, do we know Him within the history of the American experience as slanted by white people or should we seek to understand God in our history as black people? What is to be said about the moral integrity of the white interpretation of history?
7. Is a theology of violence possible and what would it say about the role of violence in effecting social change?
8. Is it theologically valid to speak of a black Christ or a white Christ? Whatever were the historic circumstances under which the Christ figure first appeared, must the historic situation and the elements with which it consists be considered eternally and universally authentic, valid and normative?

BARGAINING RIGHTS FOR FARM WORKERS

Efforts to unionize farm laborers in Delano, Rio Grande and such states as Arizona, Florida, Michigan, New York and Wisconsin continue to manifest the need for the inclusion of such workers and their employers under the prospective services of the National Labor Relations Board. Senate Bill S.3, Sponsored by. Sen. Harrison(N.J.) and House Bill HR 4769, sponsored by Rep.O'Hara(Mich) would amend NLRA to include farm workers. WRITE CONGRESSMEN AND SENATORS NOW. PROGRESS IN TENNESSEE

The 136th Annual Convention of the Diocese of Tennessee, "desiring that all church-related institutions in the Diocese ...be open to all qualified persons of any race" and aware of the fact that "there are some qualified persons who are denied opportunities by reason of lack of financial means", has created a Committee - specifically including representatives from minority races - whose duties shall be:(1)"To develop standards by which principles of non-discrimination may be effected at all church-related institutions in the Diocese of Tennessee:

(2) To develop means of providing scholarship funds to be administered by the Committee for the benefit of needy, qualified students of all races."

Reliable sources inform us that following this Convention, the Board of Trustees of St. Mary'sEpiscopal School in Memphis - last year a recipient of $25,000 gift from the Diocese for their Development Fund - held a meeting and voted to open their doors to "any qualified applicants." There are even rumors floating that the school is prepared to consider policies of active recruitment of non-white students and that one prominent churchman in Memphis has offered to provide scholarship funds to enable St.Mary's to practice this new policy.

SEMINARIAN SOUGHT FOR SIP PROJECT

Fr. Francis X. Walter,Director of the Selma Interreligious Project(SIP) is seeking our assistance in locating a student or students who might like to apply for a grant from the Jonathan Myrick Daniels Fellowship Committee. Such a grant - up to $1,500 to seminarians of any accredited AATS seminary on leave for the academic year 1968-69 - would be used under terms of a project designed by the student (s), Fr. Walter and one of the Black Belt grass roots organizations. Fr. Walter foresees "some sort of project in which the student would be responsible to the organization and its goals, but would have a relationship to SIP."

Time is very short on this project as applications for the grant are due at ETS by April 15th. If you know anyone interested in serving in the state in which Jon Daniels gave his life, please have him contact Fr. Walter at once c/o SIP, 810 - 29th Avenue, Tuscalosa, Ala. 35401. PIC & ESCRU TO FORM CLOSER TIES

At the invitation of PIC's Executive Secretary, The Rev.Roger A. Harless, Acting Director Dreisbach attended the Executive Committee meeting of the Presbyterian Interracial Council held in Los Angeles on March 8th and 9th. Potential combined projects include the joint publication of resource materials and the development of Suburban Action Centers (SACs) in areas where both groups have Chapters.

At the conclusion of the board meeting, the Rev. Messrs. Harless and Dreisbach visited joint meetings of PIC and ESCRU steering committee members in Los Angeles, San Diego and San Francisco. Though ESCRU does not currently have a Chapter in the San Francisco area, Vice Pres. Earl Neil and the Rev. Richard Byfield are currently at work to organize such a unit.

CHAPTER NEWS

CHICAGO - Mrs. Octavia Miles has devised an effective and relatively painless way by which Chapter members can help swell the national treasury. A $1.00/month assessment(also payable in a lump sum of $12.00 for the year) is being collected and forwarded to the Atlanta office. CLEVELAND - A record 185 persons attended the annual ESCRU luncheon, heard Leon Modeste explain his mission as the Director of the General Convention Special Program and honored Mary Hooker Glendinning with the Human Relations Award. A $200 profit from the luncheon was given to the Welfare Rights Movement. MARYLAND - The February meeting of the Maryland Chapter considered the implications for human relations as contained in the proposed Constitution for the State of Maryland. A special 3-man committee is at work in developing ways to get the ESCRU"message" to more churchmen in the Diocese. The Chapter continues to contribute to and cooperate with the Activists (for Fair Housing) and the Citizens Planning and Housing Association and recently made a $50 grant to the local U-Vote project. MILWAUKEE - Milwaukee ESCRU is now structured into three action groups: (1) Urban Affairs - currently concentrating their efforts in support of an NAACP suit against the school board; (2) Diocesan Committee - researching ways in which diocesan structure and power can be used more effectively; (3) Parish Committee - an educational approach providing speakers for informal discussion at breakfasts, adult and teenage groups and developing dialog sermons for presenting to entire congregations. MINNESOTA - Bp. Philip F. McNairy, himself a member of ESCRU, has requested the Chapter to select "heutral" places(i.e. homes or auditoriums) for meetings when speakers "might be in favor of violence or overthrow of the government." The request in the form of a letter to Fr. Denzil A. Carty,Chapter Chairman, following an appearance of Dr. Herman Dillard, a Minneapolis doctor, dressed as a Ku Klux Klansman wearing two pistols and carrying a rifle. At a meeting devoted to black power, Dr. Dillard advocated the formation of an armed black "Community Protection Unit." Fr. Carty, though he does not believe that Dr. Dillard advicated violence or overthrow of the government, will not disobey the Bishop's request, but will seek "other churches in which to present the message." NEW JERSEY - Continuing their concern for farm laborers which began with building support for two migrant labor bills passed by the New Jersey State Legislature last December, the N.J. Chapter devoted its February meeting to a panel discussion led by three experts on the plight of the migrant worker in that state. PHILADELPHIA - Following its January Consultation on Racism, members of the Pennsylvania Chapter are studying the newly-formed Committee Against Racism with the possibility of forming a "white caucus" to deal with those practices and policies which are peculiar to the racism prevelant in white suburbia. SAN DIEGO - ESCRU President, The Rev. Jesse F. Anderson, was the speaker at an informal dinner meeting held in his honor and as a means for raising funds for the national organization. Thanks to his hostess, Board member Mary E. Oliver who "was born turned on", Fr. Anderson had many opportunities to speak before concerned Churchmen during his week's stay in Southern California as an official delegate to the meeting of the National Council of Churches. The San Diego Chapter is currently working to support the claim of Mr. Thomas Johnson, local president of the NAACP, that the racism of San Diego makes it something less than an "All-American City" and that the current harassment by its police force of a black teenage center is evidence of repression rather than of the renewal which is so sorely needed. ST. LOUIS - Under the leadership of Chairman Connie Witte, a revitalized St. Louis Chapter is back on the battle lines again. The board of directors has endorsed a move, originally sponsored by the Episcopal Neighborhood Ministries Group, to encourage Episcopal clergymen to resign from the Missouri Athletic Club until it admits Negroes as members and guests. George Johnson, Chairman of the Chapter's committee on civil disorders, is organizing a challenege to the city to establish a much-needed police department civilian review board by June the 1st.

THE EPISCOPAL SOCIETY FOR CULTURAL AND RACIAL UNITY

TRINITY I NEWSLETTER JUNE 16, 1968

DEATH CLAIMS TWO DREAMERS

In a time of bewilderment, frustration and bitter strife, this nation and the world could ill-afford the loss of two of its greatest dreamers - the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and Senator Robert F. Kennedy. It really should come as a surprise to us as citizens that a nation such as ours - born in blood, a country which throughout its history from the slaughter of the Indians through the banana wars of Latin America and extending to the cities and villages of Vietnam - which has continually advocated and practiced violence to achieve its goals would inevitably inspire others to use the same tactics to settle their perceived differences.

The "realists" in our midst continue to chant that "Thus it has been since the earth began, and thus it shall always be." Another blue ribbon investigatory commission has been appointed by the same President who has yet to endorse his own comission's Report on Civil Disorders. The findings of the new commission will serve only to buttress that which is already known. Sad to relate, the "Report from Iron Mountain" is more likely to dominate our nation's future policies than the principles which were long-ago delivered to our ancestors on tablets from Mount Sinai.

I for one am fed up with the reality which cuts of the lives of the Kings and the Kennedys and others who dare to challenge the System. My vote, and I hope that of ESCRU and the larger Church, goes to the dreamers who may agree to "tell it like it is", but who refuse to accept it like it is. Dr. King dreamed that "one day ...the sons of former slaves and the sons of former slave owners will be able to sit down together at the table of brotherhood." Senator Kennedy, quoting Shaw, phrased it this way: "Some men see things as they are, and ask why; I dream things that never were, and ask why not?"

ESCRU will continue to dream and to ask "Why-not?", for on the day that we fail to do so we will deny Him who dreamed "That all might be One."

A.R.D.

BOARD DECIDES TO FOCUS ON SUBUREAN RACISM DREISBACH NAMED AS NEW EXEC. DIRECTOR

Meeting in Chicago on May 31-June 2, the Society's Board of Directors decided to devote ESCRU's 8th Annual Meeting to an in-depth analysis and strategy session aimed at identifying and rooting out racism within the predominantly white community. A news release stated in part:

> "Although ESCRU will continue to support the just demands reflected in the agenda and priorities set by members of the black and dispossessed communities, the Society's principal effort will be directed towards those portions of the white community which determine the policies of the latter's economic, educational, social and religious structures and institutions."

In other action at the Chicago meeting, the Board named Kim Dreisbach as its new Executive Director. Fr. Dreisbach joined the staff of the Society in 1965 as Associate Director, and has held the position of Acting Director since the resignation last September of ESCRU's founder, the Rev. John B. Morris.

ECSA CALLS FOR DAY OF PRAYER ON JUNE 23RD

The Episcopal Churchmen for South Africa calls upon all concerned churchmen to join with them in a Day of Prayer upon the day of the forced exile of the Rt. Rev. Robert H. Mize from South West Africa. Your prayers are asked for -

- Bishop Mize of Damarland who is being expelled from South West Africa by the illegal occupying power, the Republic of South Africa;
- All the people of South West Africa;
- Those South West Africans in exile because of their opposition to apartheid and the illegal occupation of their country;
- Polycarp Haihambo, being ordained by Bishop Mize to the diaconate on June 23, and for the continuance of the ministry of the Christian Church in South West Africa.

A PLEA TO DELINQUENT MEMBERS

With staggered renewal dates, it is difficult for even the most conscientious of us to remember just when we should send that check to the national office. Graduations, weddings and vacations all contribute to helping us forget our obligations. ESCRU can be only as strong as its supporters. If you have forgotten to pay your dues and are still committed to the Society's goals, please send your renewal check to us today.

FR. NICKERSON TO CLEVELAND

The Rev. David B. Nickerson, the Director of Southern Field Service has accepted a call to become the Rector of the Church of the Incarnation in Cleveland, Ohio. Fr. Nickerson made a great sacrifice to come on the ESCRU staff, knowing in advance that the foundation support for this project would terminate in the summer.

Witnessing to the ministry of reconciliation throughout the Southeast has demanded many miles of travel and many lonely hours spent away from family and friends. Most recently, Nick has been running a shuttle service between Durham, N.C and Resurrection City transporting clothing for its residents and collegiate volunteers to work in the Poor People's Campaign.

ESCRU is sincerely grateful for the ministry which Fr. Nickerson has given in our name and wish him and his family much happiness and success in their new parish.

SEGREGATED CLUBS - NOT A MATTER OF DEBATE FOR CHRISTIAN CONSCIENCE

This issue of the Newsletter contains a major report on the St. Louis Chapter's recent battle with the Missouri Athletic Club. Recently in the Diocese of Western New York, ESCRU member Fr. Jack Whiteford joined four other Churchmen in signing a statement of concern over a bishop's allowing himself "to be honored at a reception in a club that segregates by membership." The Rt. Rev. C. Kilmer Myers has gone on record in the Pacific Churchman by stating:"I would urge all clubs which practice discrimination to end such customs forthwith. If they do not, my advice to clergy belonging to them (I cannot command) would be their withdrawalfrom membership."

ESCRU would go beyond Bp. Myers and extend his counsel to all Christians - especially to laymen who make up the majority of such clubs. Those who are not Christians may have the right to determine their own qualifications for membership, but those of us who are have the obligation not to cooperate with evil. A club which discriminates solely on the basis of a man's race or religion is an abomination to Him who died that "all might be one", and no amount of rationalization will justify a Churchman's remaining in such a club if it refuses to change its racist policies./A.R.D.

CHAPTER NEWS

MICHIGAN - Dealing with such problems as riots, race, fear and social justice, WWJ-TV is producing a 5 program series aimed at reaching 300,000 people involved in living room dialogues in the Detroit area. Michigan ESCRU is aiding this project by delivering tens of thousands of promotional brochures to parishes in the diocese. MILWAUKEE - A panel of 4 or 5 persons "available to speak to any parish in the Milwaukee area for the purpose of stimulating further discussion and action in each parish regarding the racial crisis today" is now busy fulfilling invitations as part of the efforts of the Chapter's Parish Committee. Fr. William Miles has served as moderator for workshops on "The Riot Report and the Churches" held by the Chapter in Milwaukee and Racine. MINNESOTA - Minnesota ESCRU recently convinced the Diocese to include Dr. Nathan Wright, Jr., Executive Director of the Department of Urban Work of the Diocese of Newark, as one of the principal speakers in a six-week Urban Seminar held at the Cathedral Church of St. Mark. Dr. Wright's topic was "Black Power-The Challenge to the Church." The Chapter also played host to Kim Dreisbach in May who was in Minneapolis to represent National ESCRU at PIC's Annual Meeting where joint strategy for the two groups was planned. NEW JERSEY - Chairman Oscar Barker of the New Jersey Chapter has written a letter of congratulation to both Bp. Banyard and the Presiding Bishop with respect to the appointment of the Rev. Canon Isaiah G. Bell to succeed the late Canon Edwin W. Tucker as the Executive Secretary of the Board of Field Services of the Diocese of New Jersey. PENNSYLVANIA - A plea requesting a contribution of "$25.00 or more so that the monies can be forwarded to the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, earmarked for maintainence of persons at 'Resurrection City'" has been circulated to all parishes in the Diocese by Chairman Rollins and the Pennsylvania Chapter. SAN DIEGO - Acting on the decision of the national offices to develop closer ties, the San Diego Chapters of ESCRU and PIC jointly sponsored a fund-raising concert for a local black teenage centerwhich was to have featured Oscar Brown, Jr. Because of the assassination of Dr. King on the day before the concert, the event was cancelled at the request of Mr. Brown. However, the money had been raised through the sale of several hundred tickets. PIC and ESCRU were able to present the black youth at Teen Post #1 with $700 for badly needed equipment. ST. LOUIS - Thirty-three days after ESCRU began its daily lunch-time picketting in front of the Missouri Athletic Club(MAC), the club announced on May 9th that Negroes would be permitted to apply for membership and that Negro guests would be accorded the same privileges given white visitors and guests. In March, chapter board member the Rev. William Rainford attempted to take fellow board member Mr. Lamar Smith - a school principal who is Negro - to lunch at the MAC. They were refused service and told that for the customary fee of $4 they could use a private room. An editorial in the St. Louis Post Dispatch noted:"Perhaps this is not quite as insulting as telling (negro guests) that they can eat in the kitchen." ESCRU had to respond. After sending letters to the Mayor and Bp. Cadigan, the board decided that more had to be done and a picket line was established. Mr. George Johnson of the board was designated to be in charge of this witness which began on April 8. "Jobs and money are the issues here at MAC," said Chmn. Connie Witte. "The men who eat at MAC control the jobs and the money which keep this city going." George Johnson continued to develop other ideas to convince the community of the seriousness of the situation. Letters were sent to 50 of the more than 300 St.Louis.firms which by membership in MAC for their (white) employees. The Justice Department was asked to investigate the possibility that these firms were violating federal tax laws. Board members met with the Mayor. Prominent people who held memberships in MAC were contacted, including Stan Musial of the Cardinals and Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois. Because one of its vice-presidents had been elected president of MAC's Board of Governors, the Bank of St. Louis was picketted for a short time. Finally, a "high ecclesiatical figure" conveyed a request to ESCRU from the MAC board for a moratorium on the demonstrations to allow the new board to interpret the change in their by-laws which had been ammended by a vote of 2033 to 792 to delete the word "white" wherever it appeared. ESCRU consented to a 10-day halt, but promised to resume picketting if no agreement was reached. On May 9th, MAC announced that their counsel had advised that the by-laws "must stand on their own and be applied in the same manner to all." MAC's president stressed that the decision was reached before receiving the statement from ESCRU suspending its picketting, and that the board's first impulse on receiving the Society's "intemperate" statement was to rescind the decision. He stated that the MAC board had not been influenced by ESCRU. Though MAC's decision evoked laudatory editorials in the local press, which described it as a victory for goodwill, justice, etc., the story is not yet finished. Whether any members of the black community have been invited to join MAC is as yet uncertain. At any rate, ESCRU's Bill Rainford cannot invite Lamar Smith to have lunch with him there, because MAC first suspended and then dismissed Rainford from its membership rolls for his participation in the picketting. Moreover, the Rev. Mr. Rainford was told in a telephone conversation that anyone involved in the picketting would be unwelcome at MAC. YOUNGSTOWN - A monthly meeting with U.S. Attorney Nataniel R. Jones, Deputy General Counsel for the President's Commission on Civil Disorders, has led to the creation of a series of five living room dialogues on the Kerner Report which began on the 13th of June under the leadership of the Rev. Henry N. Fukui.

ISSUES, INDIVIDUALS & INSTITUTIONS

The Vestry of St. Bartholomew's in Atlanta, Ga. unanimously adopted a resolution expressing its desire to "have enacted a strong law governing and controlling the sale of firearms, explosives and other weapons" and urging "all parishioners to write their congressmen requesting support for strong legislation to control the sale and possession of weapons"... The United Methodist Church voted to support its Board of Missions in removing a $10-million investment portfolio from the First National City Bank of New York when the latter renewed a line of credit to the Republic of South Africa. Our own Executive Council in its May meeting asked the Presiding Bishop "to name a committe to study the Church's financial relationship with South Africa. ESCRU wonders what happened to the Creighton Report on this subject which was received, filed and never publicized in Seattle on August 29, 1967. That report contains the following recommendation:"...that prior to January, 1968, banks and businesses and industries that express no moral concern for the implication of their involvment in apartheid. or who are not using their presence in South Africa as helpfully as the situation permits, be considered inappropriate holders of the invested funds of our Church." ...On the brighter side of the ledger, the Council announced that as of May 20th, $435,000 in Church funds had been deposited in Negro banks, in deposits of $15,000 each. ESCRU members will recall that in December, 1966, the Society formally requested the Council to invest some of its funds in Negro banks rather than continue to support the racist investment policies of Chase Manhattan and the First National City Bank...The 3rd annual Jonathan Daniels Fellowship Awards have been given to Robert McKay of Harvard Divinity School, Mrs. Sharon Kendall of Union Theological Seminary and Kim Nielson of New Brunswick Seminary...From an editorial in the June 2, 1968 edition of The Living Church: "It is hard to see on what point any Christian concerned about racism in the Church and in American Society could take issue with the newly revised statement of purpose of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity.. . We think it would be helpful if somewhere in this statement ESCRU were to state specifically that it was opposed to all racism...It is with the understanding that ESCRU is opposed to all racism, in whomever and in whatever form it may be found, that we endorse its statement of purpose and commend it to all Churchmen." ...Word from Memphis, Tennessee has it that two Negro children have passed their entrance examinations and will enter classes at St. Mary's Episcopal School this September... Former Board member Fr. Robert Castle was given a 60-day suspended sentence and fined $100 for his arrest in an April demonstration urging support of the Poor People's Campaign in front of Jersey City's City Hall.

The Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

THE PURPOSE of this Society shall be to encourage men to respond positively to God's call for unity in joyful anticipation of a community where blacks and whites, haves and have-nots, may enjoy full equality and justice. We commit ourselves to work for the total eradication of racism in the Church, the nation and the world so that true reconciliation and unity, which are the outgrowth of equality and justice, may be realized in human life.

ESCRU

Members of the Society are those who share the following awareness:

Racism is subtly yet deeply ingrained in the American psyche and in the economic, educational, social and religious structures and institutions of this nation. It has lead to an imbalance of power within and beyond our society by which non-white persons are imprisoned in a state of dependency and powerlessness.

Penitently confessing our own sins of commission and omission which have served to perpetuate this racism, we the members of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity pledge ourselves to the continuing witness for Truth, Justice, Freedom, Power and Love in faithfulness to Jesus Christ who values all men equally and who lived, died and was raised from the dead that all might be One in Him. We profess the essential unity of God with man, and man with man, proclaimed in the sacraments of Baptism and Holy Communion. We further believe that talk of Unity between men in the absence of Equality has been in vain, and that talk of Love between them where there is not Justice is meaningless. We therefore recognize the demand for Equality, Power and Justice for non-white and dispossessed persons as a legitimate demand; and as the means by which true reconciliation and unity ultimately may occur.

Our society is experiencing nothing less than a black revolution against white racism. We support black and exploited persons in their search for power and justice. We constitute the Episcopal Society as a sign of this support and invite others to join in its objectives, which are:

1. To confront ourselves and others with the existence of racism in ourselves, in our Church and in our society, and with the ways the Church perpetuates that racism in its own life and in the community.

2. To educate ourselves and others about the efforts of non-white and dispossessed persons, both here and abroad, to achieve the power of self-determination, to remain in communication and dialogue with the leaders of this struggle, and to support them and their cause in every appropriate way.

3. To work for the full participation of all persons in the Church and the society at large without any distinction as to race, color, class or culture.

4. To seek out more creative uses of the Church's influence and power in the elimination of racism: through the disposition of its economic resources, through the more constructive functioning of its decision-making bodies, and through the meaningful participation of non-white persons in leadership positions within the Church.

If you agree with this Statement, take your stand with five thousand others and use the attached form to join. If there is a Chapter of the Society where you live, you will be informed about local activities. Whether you are active in a chapter or not, your membership in ESCRU makes you part of a growing fellowship of Churchmen who are ready to move beyond words into the concrete implementation of these objectives. You must decide what you can do where you are.

THE DYNAMICS OF A BLACK CAUCUS

by Homer A. Jack

If, as H. Rap Brown suggests, violence is as American as cherry pie, Black Caucuses will become as common in most American organizations as bingo. The Black Caucus--a separate subgroup of Negroes--has suddenly blossomed in many organizations as a response to the emergence of Black Power. It can be predicted that many relevant American organizations--church, labor, liberal--will soon have their national Black Caucuses, often also on local levels. Whether this is the best means for Blacks today to gain their objectives is debatable, but the dynamics of the Black Caucus--its politics, sociology, and psychology--should be probed. It can also be predicted that the appearance of Black Caucuses, let alone experiences with them, will produce deep trauma in most whites. Whether it is best for whites to encourage actively the formation of such Caucuses is also debatable, but the etiquette of dealing with the Caucus if it arises may be useful.

A Black Caucus is an attempt by Blacks to find a power base within an organization to which they nominally belong. If an organization has no Black members, it is unlikely that a Black Caucus will form. The rise of one is, in the first instance, a compliment, for it shows that the institution is not completely anachronistic but at least reflects contemporary aspects of American life. The development of a Black Caucus is also a compliment because one usually reflects hope, in the hearts of the Black members, that they respect the group or at least that they have enough faith in its past and future to want to spend time reshaping it.

A Black Caucus is a method of a group of Blacks to gain solidarity in an organization where previously they have been isolated, fragmented, dispersed--albeit "integrated." To achieve first individual identity and then group solidarity quickly, the Blacks participate in a process which is initially painful to their fellow whites. A Black Caucus, in one dimension, constitutes a short course in the humiliation of individual whites. Some would call it inverse racism. Black Caucuses by definition exclude whites (even those whites who have identified "almost completely" with Blacks). The caucuses thrive on secrecy. Their leaders are often intentionally and studiously abrasive. Additionally, they are often arrogant, demanding, certainly humorless. (These are many of the same qualities found in white supremacists!)

A Black Caucus is also a method for a group of Blacks to achieve political power. Black solidarity does not automatically result in white recognition of Black Power. Beyond humiliating the white individual, the Black Caucus next attempts to humiliate the group. This takes different forms. The caucus meetings may be called in competition with those regularly scheduled for the whole organization at a national conference. Permanent agendas are destroyed. The caucus may make normally unreasonable demands, such as 50% representation of Blacks on the steering committee of a national conference or the acceptance by the organization of Black Caucus resolutions unamended. The caucus may make unusual financial demands on the group or it may stage dramatic walkouts.

Once a Black Caucus achieves solidarity and then recognition by the group as a continuing entity within the organization, the pressure will continue. Now real negotiations can begin. Now the whites need no longer "cave in" or "sell out." Once the Black Caucus deals with the parent organization from its own power base, the old democratic, parliamentary rules should once again apply, even if courtesy may not immediately be restored. Any special rules end. Now the line can be drawn. The parent organization, including more Blacks on its boards (but not hand-picked by whites), should bargain fairly but toughly. Now the whites should not allow centuries of their racism or even their immediate guilt to make them patsies, push-overs. (Yet decades of racism could merit intentional adoption of compensatory programs.) The whole organization should accept programs suggested by the Black Caucus, not because of their Black origin, but only if they make sense. Black insights might make more sense on questions involving the Black ghetto than white conclusions, once removed. But Blacks may have no superior insights than Blacks and whites together in solving urban problems beyond the ghetto which invole the whole American society.

AN ETIQUETTE FOR WHITES

Whites, whether vicariously or through direct experience, have two initial reactions to Black Caucuses. A few immediately see their value and go along, often enthusiastically. Most whites resist. Then some whites comply emotionally, but still resist intellectually. Other whites continue to resist both emotionally and intellectually. The latter feel outraged, violated, isolated, even discriminated against. More whites who have gone through the experience of a Black Caucus in their organization eventually come to terms with the method than those who have only read or heard about it. Very often those whites most hostile are those who have previously been most active in "race relations." They somehow feel that they should be exempt from the abrasive action of the Blacks!

The role and methods of the Black Caucuses are certainly fair game for analysis in American society. The debate over its means (totalitarian? conspiratorial?) and ends, and their relationship, will and should be discussed. Beyond discussion, some whites will be faced with dealing with Black Caucuses. If one is prone to go along with a Black Caucus--at least up to the point of helping Blacks develop a power base--then some understanding of the etiquette involved may be helpful, since it is really a reflection of deeper philosophical attitudes. The following may constitute a useful guide for whites in dealing with a Black Caucus:

1. Act flattered if a Black Caucus develops in your organization. The Blacks have thus not completely given up on your organization. At this moment in history, be more concerned if no Black Caucus develops.

2. Relax when a Black Caucus develops. Accept the insults as they come, remembering that our white ancestors for centuries and decades, and we ourselves still today, have affronted Black people in far more permanently hurtful forms.

3. Swallow hard, even eat humble pie--not because you must, but because you should. Don't be disturbed if some other whites, or your conscience, suggest that you're selling out your cherished democratic principles. The mystique of the Black Caucus may contain negative aspects, although some of the rhetoric may be hyperbole--like that of the Old Testament prophets.

4. Maintain compassion and sensitivity, but once a Black power base has been achieved, no longer suspend your sense of judgment..

5. Don't use sarcasm. It seldom has its uses in these situations.

6. Do not presume on old Black-white personal relationships. They may not continue automatically, at least not during national conferences where Black Caucuses emerge.

7. Go along with the semantic rules. Try to use the word, Black, instead of Negro. (There is no more logical reason to capitalize Black than Negro; but it is increasingly expected and it is harmless to conform to this expectation). It is reported that even in new Black Caucuses, some Blacks forget to use the right word! Also don't use the term, integration, at least at this moment in history.

8. Maintain your faith in what may perhaps best be termed in America an "open society." To the degree that the Black Caucus movement is successful, Black Caucuses will eventually whither away and dissolve just because they will no longer be needed. Opinions differ widely as to how transient a phenomenon the Black Caucus may be.

9. Don't feel bad if you are called a "white liberal." Don't feel hurt if Blacks refuse to acknowledge or even remember your past activities in what was the civil rights movement. Add up all your efforts and those of all other white Americans and the results are puny indeed compared to what the accomplishments must be. That is why Black Power emerged as one response to the failure of progress. That is why Black Caucuses are developing.

No. 277 DECEMBER 1966

THE U.S. BUDGET, THE WAR, AND THE GREAT SOCIETY

Although the President has committed the United States to development of a "Great Society" at home and throughout Asia, he has given priority to financing the War in Vietnam. In his 1967 Budget Message, the President emphasized that social development was being held below "what might have been proposed in less troubled times" because "even a prosperous nation cannot meet all its goals all at once."

In keeping with these priorities, Congress appropriated $84 billion, or $428 per capita, in 1966 for war, past and present; allocated another $12.8 billion for interest on the national debt (which is largely war-created), and $5 billion for explorations in space. Only $42 billion, or $214 per capita, was set aside for all other activities of the Federal Government. Slightly over 40% of the remaining appropriations, or $88 per capita, went to provide better health, education, welfare, and housing services to Americans. Per capita allocations for foreign aid and technical assistance dropped to about the 1963 level or $13. This is less than half the amount provided for bombs and bullets. Only $1.49 per capita was appropriated for UN activities.

But these comparisons give only a partial picture of the distortions growing out of the war. According to Sen. Joseph Clark, Pa., "20% of the top brains in all of the major departments of government are spending a major portion of their time on the war . . ." The cost of living is going up, interest rates are rising, and home construction has fallen drastically.

The Cost in Pain

An estimated 500,000 people have been killed in the Vietnamese War, including 5,949 Americans. More than one million civilians have fled the bombing; others have left the countryside because of the U.S. policy of defoliating cropland. "Ten times as many civilians are being killed and injured as are military men on both sides," according to an American doctor serving the DaNang area. But in addition to the physical pain, there is the moral degradation of the war and the economic insecurity of a situation in which the price of food may go up as much as 70% in one year. "I wonder," mused Neil Sheehan in an October 9 article in the New York Times, "whether the United States or any nation has the right to inflict this suffering and degradation on another people for its own ends. And I hope we will not, in the name of some anti-Communist crusade, do this again."

In addition, the inadequacy of the U.S. national and international development effort has been persuasively argued by the President himself. Over the past two years, the President has deplored the plight of poor America in such words as:

- "32 million Americans remain in poverty, and millions more are unable to realize their full economic potential . . ."
- "over four million [U.S. homes] do not have running water or even plumbing."
- "The reborn city we desire," is far away, partly because we "need to provide over 30% more housing annually than we are currently building" and partly because of "our chronic inability to provide sufficient low and moderate income housing, of adequate quality at a reasonable price."
- "More than 100 million Americans have inadequate public library services. . . . Almost 70 percent of the public elementary schools have no libraries."
- "One third of our nation's [hospital beds] are now in obsolete condition."

In speaking of U.S. relations with the developing world, the President has frequently called for a "bold and daring" response which will go to the "root causes of misery and unrest." He has pointed with sorrow to the fact that citizens of many lands "walk in the shadow of misery; . . . over half the people are hungry or malnourished." The President has also reminded Americans that "the 16 million people of South Vietnam survive on an average income of $100 per year. More than 60 percent of the people have never learned to read or write . . . there is only one doctor for every 29,000 people . . ."

Given these statistics, and forecasts of additional appropriations and a tax increase to help pay for the war, U.S. citizens should contemplate what ending the war could mean in terms of social betterment and human happiness. At home:

The $2.5 billion spent in Vietnam in one month could provide public libraries for 12 million Americans who have no library facilities;

* No official cost figures have been released but the $2.5 billion estimate has been used by Rep. Melvin Laird, Wis., Sens. Stuart Symington, Mo., and George McGovern, S.D.

What Further Price: For Them—For Us?

"We find ourselves," said the Chairman of the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee Sen. John Stennis, Miss., last October, "tied down and forced to commit a very substantial portion of our military manpower and resources to repel the aggression of this small, nonindustrial . . . nation with a population of about 17 million. That nation has virtually no air power; it has a very insignificant industrial capacity; and the per capita income of its inhabitants is somewhere around $150 a year. It is true it receives very substantial aid from two Communist world powers, but at the same time it is carrying most of the load as far as fighting the war is concerned . . . this matter could swiftly swing into a situation where we would have to go to the allocation of materials and the control of production . . . of prices as well as wages . . . The additional burdens will include . . . almost inevitably higher taxes."

eliminate the backlog of need for: 169,000 school teachers; 125,000 nurses; and 50,000 doctors by providing four years medical or teacher training for 344,000 young people; and give a college education to the 100,000 young people who will not go on to college in 1967 because of a lack of funds.

The $10 billion spent in Vietnam in 4 months could replace one million of the 4,000,000 dilapidated housing units inhabited by poor Americans.

The $21.3 billion that may be spent in Vietnam in the next 8½ months could build the 296,000 elementary and secondary classrooms needed to eliminate overcrowding and replace defective structures; and construct and equip the 656,500 long term care and hospital beds needed to adequately service patients.

The $38.5 billion that may be spent in Vietnam in the next 15½ months could:

cover the $10.9 billion capital needs of the rapid transit and metropolitan area bus systems over the next ten years;

supply the $14 billion of Federal grants needed for urban renewal over the next ten years; provide the $13.6 billion needed to bring air and water pollution under control.

If the $5 billion being spent in Vietnam every two months were allocated to international peace and development it could:

- wipe out the $53.3 million peacekeeping deficit of the United Nations;
- provide India with another 9 million tons of wheat to carry that country over the after effects of last year's drought;
- raise the $250 million annual capitalization of the International Development Association by $1 billion;
- double the $700 million U.S. bilateral development loan and technical assistance program;
- double the 10,000 man Peace Corps;
- allow the United States to wage the aggressive, $3.7 billion annual War against Hunger envisaged under the 1966 Food for Peace Act. Plans for this program are apparently being held to less than $2 billion per annum, partly because of Vietnam.

But, such reallocation of priorities will not take place until the U.S. citizenry demands it of Congress; for Congress, according to the President November 4, "may talk, and argue, and fight, and criticize, and play politics, from time to time, but when they call the vote on supporting the men with the key defense bills, in the Senate, it will be 83 to two, and in the House it will be 410 to five." ▶ Write your Congressman now.

INTRODUCTION

This third edition of Education in the Fifty States has been completely revised and reorganized to include up-to-date figures and a great deal of new material. The various charts bring together information about education throughout the nation and in each of the fifty states.

As an illustration of how to use this handbook, we might take the state of Pennsylvania. From these charts one can learn that Pennsylvania is slightly above the national average in per capita income (Column A), but slightly below average in per pupil expenditure for elementary and secondary education (Column B). Pennsylvania therefore ranks low in "effort," that is in school expenditure as a percentage of personal income (Column C). Pennsylvania spends only 3.65% of its personal income on elementary and secondary schools, compared to the national average of 4.74%. By glancing through the chart, it can be seen that Pennsylvania is among the lowest states in effort. Pennsylvania, more easily than many states, could maintain adequate levels of educational expenditure. By committing 6.09% of its income to elementary and secondary education, less than several states are already doing, Pennsylvania could raise its per pupil expenditure to $800 (Column D), enough to pay teachers an average of $8,000 a year and to match New York State's average expenditure for other current needs. The average state would need to spend 7.83% of its income to accomplish the same result, and many states would need to commit more than a tenth of their income to education.

The state government provides 43.4% of educational expenditures in Pennsylvania, slightly higher than the national average (Column N), but considerably less than many other states do. Local communities pay 53.6% of school costs and Federal assistance accounts for only 2.8% of school costs. It should, of course, be noted that these figures are for a school year prior to the enactment of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

Inadequate support for education is reflected in several ways. Teachers' salaries in Pennsylvania are below the national average (Column E), considerably lower than they should be in view of the resources of the state. A surprising 58.2% of the schools in Pennsylvania have no school library (Column G). Classroom shortages in Pennsylvania are severe. The state now has 79,500 classrooms in use (Column I), but 19,800 new classrooms are needed to replace substandard classrooms now in use (Column J) and an additional 16,900 classrooms are needed to bring class size down to 25 elementary and 20 secondary pupils to a room (Column K), making a total of 36,700 new classrooms needed in the state (Column L).

Dropouts in Pennsylvania are fewer than for the nation as a whole, with 80.8% of the ninth graders in public school going on to graduate from the twelfth grade (Column H). Columns R, S, and T tell the story of what happened to a typical group of 1000 Pennsylvania students who entered the ninth grade, either in public or non-public schools, in the fall of 1960. In 1964, 815 of them graduated from the twelfth grade, 185 of them having dropped out somewhere along the way. Of those who graduated, 309 entered their freshman year of college in the fall of 1964. In Nevada 528 of the original 1000 would have entered college and in California 724 of the original 1000 would have started college. These figures, computed by the AFL-CIO Education Department, have not been published prior to their appearance in this handbook.

With regard to higher education, Pennsylvania's per capita public expenditure is considerably below average, $6.29 as compared to the national average of $14.12 (Column U). Perhaps this partially explains the fact that fewer of Pennsylvania's high school graduates enter college than is the case in the average state, 38% in Pennsylvania as compared to 51% in the nation (Column V). Of the Pennsylvanians who do enter college, 22.4% go outside the state for their education, as compared with only 9.8% in Michigan and 5.4% in California (Column W).

Since the last edition of Education in the Fifty States, several important new programs of federal aid to education have been enacted. Some of the authorized appropriations for 1966 under these programs are given on pages 16 and 17. Pennsylvania is authorized to receive $56,501,000 for improving educational opportunity of disadvantaged children under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act; $9,410,000 under the Vocational Education Act of 1963; and $27,539,000 for student aid, academic facilities, and community extension services under the Higher Education Act of 1965.

As can be seen from the charts, many states with much less income are doing much both absolutely and relatively than Pennsylvania in elementary, secondary and higher education. Using these charts, this same kind of information can be obtained about each of the states. Some states, it will be discovered, are straining their resources to support their schools; others could do more. All in all, these charts add up to compelling statistical justification for full federal partnership in financing education from the elementary schools to the universities.

INEQUALITY OF EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY PERSISTS

Although significant gains have been made in education over the past fifteen years, inequality of educational opportunity nevertheless persists. The above chart plots educational expenditures over a fifteen year period in the five states which were highest in their per pupil current expenditure in 1964-65 and the five states which were lowest in per pupil expenditure. As can be seen from the graph, the difference in the average expenditure of the five lowest and five highest states in 1949-50 was $213; by 1964-65 school year the difference had actually widened to $337. Per pupil expenditures in the five lowest states were $127 below the national average in 1949-50. By 1964-65 they were $194 below the national average. Dollar for dollar, inequality of educational opportunity has widened rather than narrowed over the last fifteen years.

(Note: All of these figures have been adjusted to constant dollars of the 1964-65 school year.)

In the United States as a whole, for example, 73.1% of the ninth graders of 1960-61 graduated in 1964. This means that approximately 26.9% of the ninth graders dropped out of school before graduating. However, certain factors other than dropping out are included. Among them are death and in some instances migration from the state.

U.S. Rights Agency Bars Reappointment To Arkansas Critic

NYT-1/7/67

Special to The New York Times

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Jan. 6 —The United States Commission on Civil Rights did not reappoint the chairman of its Arkansas advisory committee, a critic of the commission, when his term expired Dec. 31.

Ted Lamb, 39-year-old Little Rock advertising executive, said he had not been told why he had not been reappointed. He said he understood that the commission's policy was to reappoint advisory committee members and chairmen.

In Washington, the commission's chief of information, Clarence Turner, said the commission's action had no relation to its disagreements with Mr. Lamb, but he declined to give the reason for it.

Mr. Lamb said that a commission staff member had told him in September that his resignation would be welcomed.

Two other members of the committee, Leslie W. Jordan and The Rev. James F. Drane both of Little Rock, disapproved the commission's action. Mr. Jordan is a Negro postal carrier and Father Drane is a professor at St. John's Catholic Seminary.

Both said they believed Mr. Lamb's criticism of the commission was the reason he was not reappointed.

Mr. Lamb criticized the commission in December for diluting the recommendations in the advisory committee's report on hearings that it conducted in April in eastern Arkansas.

The committee had recommended that Federal funds be withheld from five school districts and that Federal contracts with a rubber company be held in abeyance because of discriminatory hiring practices.

90th CONGRESS
1st Session

S. 1433

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

April 5, 1967

Mr. Ribicoff introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency

A BILL

To encourage and assist in the formation of local organizations by residents of urban neighborhoods for the purpose of improving the physical, economic, and social conditions prevailing in such neighborhoods.

1 Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representa-
2 tives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,
3 That this Act may be cited as the "Neighborhood Develop-
4 ment Corporation Assistance Act".

5 POLICY AND PURPOSE

6 SEC. 2. The Congress finds that citizen-based neighbor-
7 hood organizations must play a vital role in assisting elected
8 and appointed officials to effectively deal with community
9 development needs. Citizen involvement at the neighbor-

1 hood level must develop to determine community needs,
2 mobilize the human resources of the neighborhood, and co-
3 ordinate them with public and private resources for effective
4 and acceptable community development efforts. The Con-
5 gress finds that such acceptability on the neighborhood level
6 is essential for successful development programs.
7 Congress therefore declares that the Neighborhood De-
8 velopment Corporation, as described herein, provides the 9 framework for neighborhood involvement to achieve the 10 above-stated purposes. Citizenship participation within such 11 legally constituted neighborhood corporations will create for 12 the individual a new self-image as a responsible decision-13 making citizen and member of the community, it will enable 14 the inhabitants of the neighborhood to determine their needs
15 and come to a corporate decision to take initiatives in ob-
16 taining desired projects and carrying out responsibilities
17 assumed under them, and it will foster coordination of all
18 development projects into a viable system for efficient com-
19 munity development.

3 the charter and bylaws of which each resident of such
4 neighborhood is assured of an equal opportunity to participate

HOUSE PANEL CUTS MODEL CITIES AID

NYT 5/13/67

Rent Supplement Fund Also Slashed Far Under Total Requested by Johnson

FED. POLICY

By MARJORIE HUNTER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 12 — The House Appropriations Committee approved limited funds today for the controversial model cities and rent supplement programs.

The committee, following the recommendations of its housing subcommittee, deeply slashed the sums that President Johnson had sought for both programs.

Only $237-million of the $662-million sought for model cities was approved and just $15-million of the $45-million asked for rent supplements was granted.

However, the housing subcommittee chairman, Joe L. Evins, Democrat of Tennessee, said the fact that both programs had been kept alive at all was "a great victory for the Administration.

"We had some mighty close votes," Mr. Evins said.

He also indicated that at one point his subcommittee had virtually reached an impasse over funds for the model cities program.

Funds for the two programs were included in a $10-billion appropriations bill to finance 16 independent agencies and the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

In all, the committee reduced budget requests by nearly $800-million.

House leaders have scheduled floor action on the money bill for next Tuesday.

The model cities program is regarded by the President as the keystone of his effort to erase urban blight. It seeks to link Federal spending with local attacks on the physical and social ills of selected slum neighborhoods across the country.

The program was authorized last year by Congress after months of uncertainty. At times, it appeared that it might be shelved entirely.

The extent of Congressional reluctance was reflected in the fact that just $11-million, for planning alone, was appropriated for the fiscal year that ends June 30.

About 190 cities and towns in 47 states have applied for planning grants. Of these, 60 to 80 will be chosen within the next two months.

However, the cutback in appropriations could limit the number of cities eventually selected for actual program grants.

The program of rent supplements for the poor has encountered even more Congressional hostility than model cities. It won House approval in 1965 by just six votes and was then cut off without a cent.

For the current fiscal year, Congress appropriated 20-million to construct housing for low-income families and $2-million to subsidize rent payments.

The Appropriations Committee today limited construction funding to $10-million in the coming fiscal year, which would cover only about 11,000 of the 44,000 rental units the President had hoped would be rebuilt.

The committee granted the full $5-million in rent subsidy payments that the President had sought.

The committee appropriated the full $750-million the President had asked for urban renewal and slashed just $15-million from the requested $290-million for low rent public housing projects, containing 688,764 apartments.

The committee appropriated $175-million for mass transit grants. $50-million more than this year but $55-million under the sum requested.

Cuts were also made in urban planning grants, open space land programs, neighborhood facilities grants and other housing programs. The $30-million requested for metropolitan development incentive grants was eliminated.

The major share of the overall $10-billion appropriation goes to the Veterans Administration. Only a token $2.3-million was cut from the V.A.'s $6.6-billion budget request.

Report to Business Council Foresees Vietnam Costs Reaching $26.9-Billion

TAX INCREASE FAVORED

A $15-Billion Federal Deficit and Decline in Corporate Profits Are Predicted

By EILEEN SHANAHAN

Special to The New York Times

HOT SPRINGS, Va., May 12 —The cost of the war in Vietnam is likely to rise next year by $5-billion over the Administration's current official estimates, a group of business economists predicted today.

The forecast, made after extensive consultations with Government officials, has no public backing from any Government source.

The predicted increase would raise the cost of the war to $26.9-billion in the 1968 fiscal year, which begins next July 1.

The increased war costs, coupled with some other adverse budgetary developments, will raise the budget deficit for the new fiscal year from an official estimate of $8.1-billion to between $15-billion and $18-billion, the business economists predicted.

Government officials have publicly given no indication that they consider any such increase in war costs to be likely. There have been no official revisions of the $21.9-billion Vietnam war expenditure figure contained in the President's budget message of last January.

Build-Up Being Considered

The possibility of accelerating the build-up of forces in Vietnam beyond the schedule made public in January is currently under discussion within the Administration, however, although the decision is believed not to have yet been made.

The prediction of the large increase in war costs was given today to a group of the nation's leading business executives by a committee of economists who work for their companies.

The economists prepare such a forecast for their chiefs twice a year, after lengthy talks with Government officials in the Council of Economic Advisers, the Treasury Department and other agencies.

The report was presented to members of the Business Council by Ralph Lazarus, president of the Federated Department Stores, Inc., who is chairman of the Business Council's Committee on the Domestic Economy.

The council is an organization of some 120 men, most of them the heads of large corporations, who advise the Government on policy issues.

Mr. Lazarus did not detail the reasons for the expected $5-billion military budget increase other than to label it "for Vietnam escalation." He added that the $5-billion figure was "very conservative—the lowest figure we've heard."

He declined to specify which Government officials the economists had talked to or the extent to which the $5-billion figure may have been based on Government estimates.

Senator John Stennis, Democrat of Mississippi who is a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, recently estimated that Vietnam spending next year would go up by $4-billion to $6-billion over the Administration's estimate.

A least one Government official who talked to the business economists confirmed in a telephone interview today that he had mentioned the Senator's figure to the group. He said, however that the conversation on this point was purely hypothetical—converning what the economic impact would be if Senator Stennis's figure was right.

For the present fiscal year, which ends June 30, the Government's original estimate of the cost of the war in Vietnam is now expected to fall $10-billion short of the actual expenditures.

The original estimates, however were based on the assumption that the war would end during the fiscal year, a factor that accounted for much of the error. For next year, no such assumption about the end of the war was made.

The Administration's deficit estimate in the January budget was $8.1-billion. The business economists added $5-billion in expenditures for the war and subtracted $2.5-billion for lower tax collections that they expect this year because of lower corporate profits. With these calculations the deficit would be raised to more than $15-billion.

If, in addition, Congress refused to enact the 6 per cent tax increase that President Johnson has proposed, the deficit would be raised more than $18-billion, the business economists said.

The economists favored the tax increase—as did a number of the corporate executives—but said it should be put into effect on October, rather than in July, as the President originally asked.

Tax-Rise Delay Backed

The delay in raising taxes was seen as desirable because the economy is currently going through a period of softness.

The business economists felt, and the corporate executives generally agreed, that business would start to turn up again by the final quarter of this year, possibly earlier.

Mr. Lazarus said that he personally was for the proposed tax increase for just this reason.

The chairman of the business council, Albert L. Nickerson, chairman of the board of the Mobil Oil Corporation, also indicated his agreement with the tax increase plan. He said that the inflationary pressures that were "latent" during the first quarter, while business was sluggish, would probably revive in the lattter part of this year.

Mr. Lazarus described the period of slight business slowdown that the economy has encountered this year as not a recession but a "minicession—which means that it is short but interesting."

Fred J. Borch, president of the General Electric Company said that he thought the problem of businesses getting rid of excessive inventories—which has been seen by Government and private economists alike as the main economic problem this year—"will be behind us more quickly than most people think."

Administration Bloc Rallies to Defeat a $237-Million Cut in Slum Program

WASHINGTON, May 17—The House refused today to permit further expansion of the controversial rent supplement program. The vote was a major defeat for the Johnson Administration.

By 232 to 171, the members upheld a Republican-sponsored amendment to slash from $10-million to zero the amount of money that the Government could commit in the fiscal year 1968 for new rent supplement projects.

A few minutes later, however, the Administration rallied its forces in time to save the model cities program, President Johnson's major new plan for rehabilitating city slums.

By a roll-call vote of 213 to 193, the members turned back a Republican move to cut $237-million from the model cities program and thereby reduce it to just $12-million in planning funds.

Debate Is Sharp

The two votes were preceded by sharp debate. Administration strategists, quartered in a command post a few feet from the House chamber, had anticipated trouble on rent supplements but felt they possessed a slim majority on model cities.

Both expectations were confirmed.

The vote on rent supplements does not technically kill the program. Following the advice of its Appropriations Committee, the House approved $5-million to enable the Administration to honor past commitments to pay rent subsidies for poor tenants.

But by overturning the committee's recommendation to provide $10-million in funds to make new commitments—a recommendation that itself was $30-million below Mr. Johnson's original request—the House in effect froze any further growth of the program.

Administration hopes for restoration of rent supplement funds now lie with the Senate, where no action has been taken. Mr. Johnson's strategists are also depending on the Senate to restore his original $662-million request for model cities, which was trimmed to $237-million by the House Appropriations Committee even before it reached the floor.

The action on rent supplements provoked a sharp statement early this evening from Robert C. Weaver, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

"The Republican leadership in the House of Representatives," he declared, "has again victimized the poor. By spearheading the attack upon appropriations for rent supplements, they took a major step towards denying decent housing to some 200,000 Americans."

Under the dent supplement program, first authorized by Congress as part of the Housing Act of 1965, the housing agency is empowered to make commitments — to nonprofit sponsers of new or rehabiliated housing projects—to pay a certain portion of the rent of poor tenants.

$32-Million Appropriated

The payments go to the owner of the project, not to the tenant himself. The size of the payment consists, in simplest terms, of the difference between the amount the tenant is expected to pay for rent—a minimum of one-fourth his monthly income — and the amount the sponsors needs to break even on the project.

So far, Congress has appropriated $32-million for the program, of which $30.5-million has already been committed to 405 projects in over 250 communities.

These projects, when completed, are expected to contain roughly 33,000 dwelling units for 100,000 persons. The original Johnson Administration request for $40-million in additional contract authority would have provided low-rent housing for about another 100,000 persons.

The vote on the rent subsidy scheme indicates that the old coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats continues to be—particularly since the 1966 elections — A powerful source of opposition to the Great Society.

The Republican leaders, much to the annoyance of the Southerners, have been insisting that they did not intend to renew the old alliance. Yet it existed in practice today.

Votng to halt the rent supplement program were 163 Republicans and 69 Democrats, of whom 63 were from the 11 Southern states. Voting for the program were 159 Democrats and 12 Republicans. Of these, five were New Yorkers: Seymour Halpern of Queens, Theodore R. Kupferman of Manhattan, Agden R. Reid of Westchester, and Daniel E. Button and Frank Horton, both of upstate New York.

On the model cities vote, the opposition lost strength from both sids of the coalition. Only 141 Republicans and 52 Democrats voted to kill the bulk of model cities funds, while 178 Democrats and 35 Republicans voted to preserve thm.

The two measures were part of a $10-billion money bill to finance the programs of the Department of Housing and Urban Development and several other agencies. Following the roll-calls on model cities and rent supplements, the House overwhelmingly passed the full measure by a 347-56 roll-call vote. The measure now goes to the Senate.

The Democrats used some of their most influential members to resist Republican attempts to cut the model cities program. Speaker John W. McCormack, Massachusetts Democrat, called the problem of the cities "one of the greatest challeng public servants and adde

Senate Unit Gives Backing To More Liberal G.I. Bill

WASHINGTON, May 17 (AP)—The Senate Labor Committee approved today a bill liberalizing the cold war G.I. law that was passed last year to provide education and other benefits to veterans who served since the Korean war.

The principal changes in the bill would increase the monthly educational payments and broaden the formula governing the benefits available to students.

The Veterans Administration estimates the cost of the program at $547-million for the first year if the bill becomes law. This would mean an increase of $161-million.

However, the increase resulting from the bill is estimated at $1.4-billion over the next five years.

Kirk Carried Dixie Banner To GOP Governors Meeting

MIAMI, Fla., Dec. 17 — Florida Gov.-Elect Claude Kirk went to the conference of the Republican Governors Association at Colorado Springs to speak for the South.

And speak out he did, so impressively that his colleagues gave him one of the five places on the association's executive committee.

Kirk, the only governor from the deep South at the conference, argued that regardless of who the Republicans nominate for president in 1968, it would help the GOP cause if southerners knew that they had someone who could speak for them among the leadership of the association.

A conservative in what appears to be a rising tide of new Republican liberalism, it is debatable the imprint Kirk will make on the national GOP.

BUT, SEVERAL governors at the Colorado conference said that Gov. George Romney of Michigan, was less impressive during the meeting than were Kirk, Gov.-Elect

FLORIDA

Ronald Reagan, of California, and Gov. James Rhodes, of Ohio.

Named to serve on the association's executive committee along with Kirk, were Reagan, and Gov. Tim Babcock, of Montana, all conservatives, Govs. John A. Love, of Colorado, and John A. Chaffee, of Rhode Island, both moderates.

While the conservatives outnumber the moderates, this was viewed as an overture to draw conservatives into the policy-making machinery.

Moderate control of the association was not endangered by the move as the executive committee can do nothing without the entire association voting on an action unless the five governors are unanimous.

KIRK REFUSED to take part in an effort by moderate governors to get behind a moderate candidate for the Republican presidenital nomination in 1968.

"I'm not going to fall into any clique," said Kirk. "And I didn't come here to discuss 1968. I came here to talk about state problems."

In answer to a question as to whether he could support Romney for the 1968 presidential nomination, Kirk recalled he headed up the Florida Democrats for Nixon organization in 1960, adding, "While a candidate for the U. S. Senate in 1964, I supported Goldwater. If you give loyalty, you get loyalty."

POLITICAL observers generally place Kirk in Richard Nixon's corner, at least, at this time. Nixon has always been strong with Florida's GOP leadership.

Florida's GOP convention delegates have always had conservative leanings.

At the 1964 convention, 32 Florida delegates voted for Barry Goldwater and two for William Scranton.

Nixon, no doubt, further solidified himself with Florida GOP leaders when he campaigned for several Republican nominees for Congress leading up to the November general election.

The former vice president is also a frequent winter visitor to the Miami area.

Florida will again have 34 delegates to the 1968 convention. Kirk is expected to have a major voice in which way they will go.

Kirk Makes Fast Move

TALLAHASSEE, Jan. 7 — Claude Kirk became Florida's first Republican governor in 94 years on Tuesday and immediately declared war on the state's ancient constitution and upon crime.

Both actions were followups on campaign promises. But his bold approach to rewriting the constitution of 1885 came as an unexpected shock.

Kirk's first official act as governor was to sign a proclamation calling for a special session of the Legislature to convene on Monday to revise the constitution.

This took the many legislators, mostly Democrats, in Tallahassee for the inauguration completely by surprise. Legislative leaders had planned on a special constitutional revision session at the conclusion of the regular 1967 session next summer.

But Kirk, who promised a new day in government, said:

"For the Legislature to labor 60 days in April and May to rewrite our laws, without first rewriting our constitution, is not consistent with good business-like procedure."

WHILE KIRK quickly showed who was boss, he left some state employes — the members of the Legislature — in a generally disgruntled frame of mind.

The legislators didn't quarrel with the philosophy behind Kirk's special session call, but rather the short notice given them to return to Tallahassee and to go to work on a new constitution.

Kirk called the present constitution a crime of antiquity. He also promised an all-out battle on four other types of crime:

1. Crime itself — crimes committed upon Florida citizens by the underworld, thugs, murderers and gamblers.
2. Crime of too expensive-government.
3. Crime of high taxes.
4. Crime of inadequate educational facilities.

KIRK SAID he meant what he had said all along—that, as governor, he would wage a continuing fight against organized crime. He named George Wackenhut of Miami head of a national investigative and security organization, director of the Governor's War on Crime at one dollar a year.

The new governor said the cost of the fight on crime will be paid for by funds from interested private citizens.

Kirk promised to make Florida number one in education. Together with State School Supt. Floyd Christian, Kirk said he planned to seek the cooperation of citizens through a series of governor's conferences on education.

The governor added that in overhauling Florida's education system, "it is obvious that money alone is not the answer," Kirk has promised there will be no new taxes during his administration.

DURING HIS inaugural speech, Kirk pledged four years of businesslike government, declaring, "Today we turn the tide against ever higher state spending."

He promised to clean up the slums of the state by marshalling the forces of free enterprise to work as partners of state and local governments.

Kirk said he would make full use of programs to war against high food costs and to build a greater agriculture industry for the state, and promised to build roads on a basis of need.

Execution Ruling May Affect the Nation

By CHARLES F. HESSER

FLORIDA

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., April 29 — An order by a federal district court judge at Jacksonville, staying indefinitely the executions of 51 men on Florida's "death row," may be of nationwide importance.

It could be as epoch-making as the U.S. Supreme Court's decision of 1954 ordering an end to racial segregation in public schools, or it could mean the end of capital punishment in the nation.

Federal Judge William A. McRae Jr., in holding up the executions, set a hearing for May 31 on a suit by the American Civil Liberties Union and the NAACP legal defense fund which charges Florida's law on the death penalty is unconstitutional.

JUDGE MCRAE'S action opened the door to a possible unprecedented ruling on the claim that the imposition of the death penalty is of itself "cruel and unusual punishment," in violation of the U.S. Constitution.

Agreement by the court to explore so fundamental a question is in a sense an extension of the same judicial philosophy which led to the Supreme Court's 1954 school decision, in that they both deal with the subject of human rights and social justice.

The liberal St. Petersburg Times called Judge McRae's ruling "an unprecedented and courageous act," adding:

"FOR YEARS, attorneys have considered capital punishment a violation of the 8th Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

"Judge McRae, by scheduling a class action hearing on behalf of 51 inmates of death row, can write a definition of national scope."

Tobias Simon, of Miami, representing the ACLU in the action which brought the stay of executions, declared:

"This case will do for capital punishment what the 1954 case did for school segregation. I feel perfectly confident that this means capital punishment will be found to be unconstitutional."

Judge McRae said he intends o go into the whole system of laws and procedures involved in capital punishment and to study particularly the Florida statute which makes the death sentence mandatory for first degree murder and rape unless a jury recommends mercy.

SIMON ARGUED in his petition the law "reduces the role of the judge to an umpire as to the rules of evidence and a rubber stamp in sentencing procedures."

The Miami attorney said the ACLU for years tried to get the issue of capital punishment before a court and that its late action was "born of desperation when we had nowhere else to turn."

Simon said the ACLU decided to bring the suit when Florida Gov. Claude Kirk's office sent notices to 14 men on death row that there no longer was any legal impediment to their executions.

The ACLU first tried the circuit court in Tallahassee, but that court dismissed the suit on the grounds it lacked jurisdiction.

MOST RECENT legal executions in Florida came nearly three years ago, when two men were electrocuted for unrelated murders.

Since then, former Gov. Haydon Burns refused during his two-year term of office to sign death warrants. Kirk, however, has been quoted as saying he favored the death penalty as a deterrent to capital crimes.

Upon learning of Judge McRae's ruling, Kirk simply said he would abide by the law.

DeWitt Sinclair, warden at the state prison at Raiford, said the judge's ruling made little impression on death row. "It might have made them feel better, but you couldn't tell it," he said.

FLORIDA AROUSED BY 'WAR' ON CRIME

Many Democrats Reported Under Gov. Kirk's Inquiry

By MARTIN WALDRON
Special to The New York Times

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., April 5 — The anticrime campaign being waged in Florida by Gov. Claude R. Kirk Jr.'s private police force appears thus far to have consisted primarily of investigations of elected officials, most of them Democrats.

The Republican Governor and his staff have refused to allow an inspection of case records in what Mr. Kirk calls the "Governor's war on crime." But a source close to the private police force said that a majority of 356 "investigations" now under way or already concluded had involved elected officials.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Thomas B. Adams, a Democrat, said that officials were so much a target of the "war on crime" that he and other state officials were "tailed" constantly by private detectives from the Wackenhut Corporation, which has leased 36 of its agents to Governor Kirk.

One agent, Mr. Adams said, sits at the Tallahassee Airport daily to check on who flies in and out of the capital city.

Kirk Tells of Fears

Governor Kirk has denied having Mr. Adams or any other state official followed. But he has declined to discuss specifics of his privately financed campaign. To do so, he said, might result in some of his agents being murdered.

Jack Ledden, a Governor's aide who works with George R. Wackenhut, a wealthy Miami private detective, in setting up investigations, would not confirm or deny that public officials had been the target of the private police force.

"However, I can assure you that if you will be patient until about June, you will be pleased with the results of the war on crime," Mr. Ledden said in an interview.

The source close to the private police force said that a number of prosecuting attorneys were under inquiry, including Richard Gerstein, a Democrat, of Miami, an area with much reported activity by mobsters.

Mr. Ledden said that it was true that "more than one" of the 36 agents had been working in Miami, but he would not comment on the report about Mr. Gerstein.

A former State Senator, James Gregory of Fort Lauderdale, a Republican who said that he disagrees politically with Governor Kirk, said he had been defeated for reelection in party primaries in February after private detectives working for the Governor had investigated him.

Mr. Gregory said the detec-dation. In a speech to the Legislature on Tuesday, Mr. Kirk asked for a State Department of Justice under the Governor's office.

Attorney General Earl A. Faircloth said that Florida needed a central agency to investigate or to coordinate existing investigations of organized crime in Florida. However, the state agency should not exist to investigate individual criminal acts, he said.

Governor Kirk hired the Wackenhut Corporation, a Miami-based concern that is the third largest detective agency in the United States, last November.

This week, the Governor said that he owed the company between $65,000 and $100,000, but he expressed confidence that the debt could be paid.

Mr. Adams, Mr. Faircloth and other members of the state Cabinet offered on Tuesday to vote Governor Kirk $25,000 from an emergency fund to pay the cost of his anticrime drive while the Legislature considered the fate of the private police force.

The Governor indicated he would not use the money, however, since this would require putting his detectives on the state payroll. He said that he did not want to identify his detectives.

Democratic legislators this week, meeting in regular session, introduced a number of bills to put direction of the crime "war" under Attorney General Faircloth, another Democrat.

Two House members, Representative George B. Stallings Jr., a conservative Democrat from Jacksonville, and Representative Kenneth M. Myers, a liberal Democrat from Miami, said they would sponsor a bill next week to make it unlawful for the Governor to investigate public officials with private detectives paid from private funds.

Mr. Ledden said that it was true that "more than one" of the 36 agents had been working in Miami, but he would not comment on the report about Mr. Gerstein.

A former State Senator, James Gregory of Fort Lauderdale, a Republican who said that he disagrees politically with Governor Kirk, said he had been defeated for reelection in party primaries in February after private detectives working for the Governor had investigated him.

Mr. Gregory said the detectives who identified themselves as working for the Wackenhut Corporation had asked numerous questions about him in his district, causing a number of voters to lose confidence in him.

One of the major nonpublic official investigations under way was reported to concern the Mafia gambler, Meyer Lansky, who operates an agency to collect bad checks written by gamblers in the Bahama Islands. Earlier, several of the Governor's private detectives helped investigate the sale of narcotics in Miami.

Secretary of State Adams, who has been a constant critic of the private police force, said that friendly hotel owners had reported to him that Wackenhut agents had asked that hotels keep a record of his visitors and his telephone calls.

One of the most widely publicized investigations by the Governor's private police force has been of five county officials in Dixie County, a farming county about 100 miles south of Tallahassee.

The Governor's detectives investigated county operations, including purchasing and the awarding of county highway contracts. The information was presented to the grand jury through the prosecuting attorney.

A Governor's aide said that when the prosecuting attorney told Mr. Kirk privately that he did not consider any violations found to be serious, the Governor relieved the prosecutor of authority over the investigation and sent in an outside prosecutor. Both prosecutors are Democrats.

School Official Ousted

The first victim of the "Governor's war on crime was a member of the Florida University Board of Regents—Woodrow J. Darden of Cocoa Beach.

Mr. Darden, who was also Brevard County school superintendent was investigated by Wackenhut agents.He was later indicted on a charge of accepting a washing machine and a dryer and two golf carts paid for by school money.

The Governor suspended Mr. Darden as school superintendent and replaced him on the Board of Regents.

Florida's sheriffs, who are subject to being removed from office by the Governor, agreed on Monday to allow Governor Kirk to investigate crime in their counties as he saw fit. The sheriffs made their agreement through the Florida Sheriffs Bureau, a state agency authorized to investigate crime only at the invitation of local officials.

After Wackenhut agents had gone into several counties to investigate sheriffs, the sheriffs association issued the Governor a "standing invitation." Ed Yarborough, director of the sheriffs bureau, said that sheriffs thought that the Governor's private police force was a "lesser evil" than a proposal made by a committee of the Legislature to give the State Attorney General broadly increased investigative powers.

Governor Kirk has challenged this Democratic recommen-

An analysis of the utilization of the Negro in the Armed Services serves as an example. The study further considers the deficiencies of the present Negro educational system.

8. PSYCHIATRIC ASPECTS OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION, Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry, 1790 Broadway, New York, New York, 1957. 95 pages, $1.00.

The observations and findings of more than 250 psychiatrists and social scientists are the substance of this study, designed to assist "in working out the knotty inter-racial problems affecting desegregation." The effects of segregation and prejudice on both majority and minority groups are examined, as are the psycho-dynamics of attitude change.

9. ST. LOUIS STORY, THE, Bonita H. Valien. Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, 515 Madison Avenue, New York 22, New York. 72 pages, $ .35.

An account and appraisal of desegregation in the city schools of St. Louis, Missouri, describing preparation and planning, as well as the roles played by community agencies, administrators, teachers, and students.

10. SEPARATE AND UNEQUAL (Public School Campaigns and Racism in the Southern Seaboard States, 1901-1915), Louis R. Harlan. University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 1958. 290 pages, $6.00.

From the fly leaf: "Here is told, in a successful blend of warm interest and cold statistics, the story of public education in the four Southern seaboard states under the impact of two powerful forces - the wave of racism that swept the South in the early 1900's and the efforts during the same period of a group of Northern philanthropists to help the crusading school men of the South toward their goal of 'universal' education. Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia swung...toward a slowly expanding public school system - and toward an ever widening inequality of education between whites and Negroes." Although, as Mr. Harlan states, this study is only indirectly related to the desegregation movement, it is of particular interest in these times of threat to the South's painfully constructed public school system.

11. SOUTHERN HERITAGE, THE, James McBride Dabbs. Alfred A. Knopf, New York, 1958. 273 pages, $4.00.

After analysing the reasons behind the rise and growth of segregation in the South, then demolishing the arguments of segregationists, the author (himself a Southern plantation owner) concludes that not only has the price of segregation been too great but the system of racial separation actually runs counter to the best features of the "Southern heritage."

12. STRIDE TOWARD FREEDOM, Martin Luther King, Jr. Harper and Brothers, New York, 1958. $2.95.

The leader of Montgomery, Alabama's protest movement against bus segregation in 1955-56 tells the story of that protest from his personal point of perspective and submits a suasive argument for non-violent resistance as a method of combating racial oppression.

13. WITH ALL DELIBERATE SPEED, edited by Don Shoemaker. Harper and Brothers 1957. 239 pages, $3.50.

Compiled by the staff members and associates of the Southern Education Reporting Service, this symposium summarizing developments in educational desegregation in the Southern and border states since 1954 emphasizes the disinterested documentation of events rather than interpretation or extensive analysis. A number of useful statistical tables are included.

136th District Newsletter

Vol. 1, # 2 360 Nelson Street, S. W. Atlanta, Ga.

This is the second issue of the 136th District Newsletter. It has been almost two months since the first issue of the newsletter was sent out. Some of you will be getting the newsletter for the first time. Once again, I'd like to ask each one of you to send me the names and addresses of other people you know who would like to receive this newsletter.

Shortly after sending the last newsletter to you, I went to Americus, Georgia at the invitation of the Sumter County Movement, the Americus civil rights group that sponsored demonstrations there.

I went with Representatives Benjamin Brown, Bill Alexander and John Hood. We spoke at three Americus churches that morning, met with leaders of the movement that afternoon, and spoke at a mass meeting that night. Representative Brown and myself joined a march to the county courthouse also.

I met with a group of professional men - doctors, lawyers, and so on - who are interested in improving job opportunities for Negroes in federal agencies in the Atlanta area. Shortly after that meeting, another meeting was held with the heads of each federal agency here.

On August 20, I went to Louisville, Kentucky, to speak at a Human Relations Seminar sponsored by the Southern Project of the National Student Association. On August 11, I met with Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen at his invitation to discuss the possibility of riots in Atlanta like those in Los Angeles and Chicago and Springfield.

On August 24, 25 & 26 I was in Madison, Wisconsin, speaking to small groups of college students at the National Student Association's Annual Congress.

On September 26, I spoke to the final meeting of the 25th Anniversary Celebration of John Hope Homes. Mrs. Tommie Pye is President of the Tenants Association.

On September 27, Representatives Benjaim Brown, John Hood, Bill Alexander and myself met with Georgia Governor Carl Sanders in his office. We asked him to improve hiring of Negroes in all levels of state government, from the lowest - where Negroes already have most of the jobs - to the highest, where we have none.

I have attended several meetings of post office employees who have complaints about hiring and promotion of Negroes in the Atlanta post office. Although Negroes represent 40% of the total employees of the post office here, we represent almost 0% of several post office departments. Despite an excellent investigation of the post office by the Atlanta NAACP several years ago, and despite several promotions of long term Negro employees, there is still much discrimination there.

On September 30, a group of employees at the post office met with myself, Representative Benjamin Brown, Mrs. Jondell Johnson of the Atlanta Inquirer and Wyche Fowler, Administrative Assistant to Congressman Charles Weltner. The postmen told Fowler they were holding Weltner responsible for any discrimination in the post office and that they expected him to solve their problems.

On October 1, I met with a group of Neighborhood Aides who work for Atlanta's War on Poverty. All of them are worried because they were not included in a pension plan for War on Poverty Employees. Some of them were worried because they don't think Atlanta's War on Poverty is doing everything that it could do.

The Aides scheduled another meeting and have talked to top officials of the War on Poverty here.

STATEMENT BY JULIAN BOND REPRESENTATIVE-ELECT -- GEORGIA HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
JANUARY 10, 1966

CONTACT SNCC COMMUNICATIONS
360 Nelson Street, SW
Atlanta, Georgia
688-0331

Before I begin my remarks I want to thank my friends and associates who have guided me toward reaching a position.

After a thorough search of my conscience, and with understanding for those who have counseled with me, I must say that I sincerely feel that I have done no wrong, but I am right in expressing my views, on whatever subject I wish to speak.

My first obligation is to my constituents, and I have released a statement to them. I wish to read it.

"A message to my constituents

There has been, during the past few days, a great deal of public discussion about me, my right to serve in the Georgia House of Representatives, and my right to speak my mind.

I stand here as a citizen, elected by other citizens, to a seat in the Georgia House of Representatives.

I stand before you today, charged with intering into public discussion on matters of national interest.

I hesitate to offer explanations for my actions or deeds, for no charge has been levied other than the charge that I have chosen to speak my mind, and no explanation is called for, for no member of the House has ever, to my knowledge, been called upon to explain his public statements or public postures as a prerequisite to admission to that body.

I therefore offer to my constituents a statement of my views: I have not counseled burning draft cards, nor have I burned mine. I have suggested that congressionally outlined alternatives to military service be extended to include building democracy at home.

The posture of my life for the past five years has been calculated to give Negroes the ability to participate in the formulation of public policies. The fact of my election to public office does not lessen my duty or desire to express my opinions, even when they differ from those held by others.

As to the current controversy, because of convictions that I have arrived at through examination of my conscience, I have decided that I personally cannot participate in war.

I stand here with intentions to take an oath that will dispel any doubts about my convictions and loyalties."

Ladies and gentlemen, the fundamental issue involved here is the right of any person in our country to dissent and to criticize governmental policy, be it national, state or local. I reaffirm my right to do this. I hope that throughout my life I shall always have the courage to dissent. Morality in politics shall always guide me in making decisions, regardless of the voices that wish to stifle protest.

I know that attacks on my integrity result from the fact that I work as the information director of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and that I am dedicated to the cause of human rights. I have worked on voter registration in many parts of this state, along with my fellow workers, .Many of you sitting here will recall that four years ago I attempted to sit in the galleries of this chamber. I was refused the right to watch the deliberation of my state government. People within the civil rights movement, especially the Atlanta student movement, were deeply involved in . . . attempts to integrate the seating facilities of the gallery of this chamber where I now stand. Moreover, many of you know that a man reported to be a Representative of the State of Georgia pushed myself and James Forman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and then ran into the chambers of the House where we could not pursue him. Because of this incident and the many other acts of terror I have seen inflicted upon Negroes in Georgia and throughout the South, I was very apprehensive about my personal safety this morning as I approached the Capitol and sat in my seat.

This feeling was accentuated because one of my fellow workers, Sammy Younge, Jr., was recently killed in Alabama as he sought to exercise his constitutional rights. Other civil rights workers have been beaten in our own state and people have been killed in Georgia in the process of exercising their rights.

I am black and I feel these injustices. I am black and I remember my treatment in this House. I know there are Negroes still in Georgia who are afraid to register to vote. I know there are public accommodations in the State of Georgia which are still segregated. I know that veterans and soldiers are still fearful for their lives as they ride down our highways.

Therefore I ran for election in the 136th Assembly District because I want to fight racial injustice in the State of Georgia and in the United States. I know that this body has the power to change the course of race relations in Georgia and thereby in the United States.

I intend to help do this within and without the legislature, seated or unseated. I have promised my constituents that I shall not relinquish the struggle for human dignity. I intend to keep that promise.

There are those who would say civil rights is one thing and politics is another. I reject that concept. I contend that we must build a new politics in Georgia, a humanistic politics concerned with the needs of people. This approach must transcend race, creed, or status in life.

While I personally know that many of my opponents would deny those of my race their constitutional rights and have aligned themselves with racist politicians, I do not wish to dignify their attacks. In a telegram of support for my position to the Governor and to the Speaker of the House, Dr. Martin Luther King said:

"It is interesting to note that many of Mr. Bond's political colleagues and critics did not feel that they were violating the U.S. Constitution when they sought to perpetuate racial segregation from their vaunted positions, or at the very least, turned a deaf ear when their friends and colleagues supported segregation and blatent racial discrimination."

Dr. King also said:

"I can vividly recall back in 1954, when the same Georgia legislature resounded with criticism of the U.S. Supreme Court and its decision on school segregation, but there was no such question of loyalty then."

I do not wish to open the past. I am willing to look forward to the future. But I must assert, assert with passion, that Georgia has the opportunity to lead the movement for humanitarian politics. I also assert that history will prove that segregation and discrimination will vanish from this state. My opponents cannot stop that development.

Let us remember that Negroes have died for the right to vote in Georgia. They are now saying what good does it do us to get the right to vote, to elect representatives only if those elected must face "attitude tests" or loyalty oaths.

I further assert this body has no basis to expel me or to censure me. It has the duty to me and to my constituents and to the State of Georgia to quit making a mockery of democracy. This body must recognize the right to dissent. This body must realize that the only just course it can take is to seat.

For at this moment this House decides not just on Julian Bond and his constituents but on whether Georgia will take steps toward a totalitarian state by curbing the right to free speech. This must not occur. It is on these principles I stand. I welcome your support.

MEET THE PRESS

MR. SCHERER: This is Ray Scherer inviting you to MEET THE PRESS. Our guest today is Julian Bond, recently elected by a landslide vote to the Georgia House of Representatives but barred from taking his seat—and who came through Washington's biggest snow storm in years to get here, today. Mr. Bond was one of the founders of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, known as SNCC, and is its communications director.

We will have the first question now from Robert Novak of the New York Herald Tribune Syndicate.

MR. NOVAK: Mr. Bond, there have been a great number of explanations of just why the Georgia House of Representatives refused to seat you.

In your own words, what is your explanation for this?

MR. BOND: I think the people involved in the fight to deny me my seat had different reasons for acting. They charged me with misconduct and questioned my credulity and said that if I took the oath of office, which requires that you swear allegience to the United States Constitution and the Constitution of the State of Georgia, I would not be credible. I could not be believed, and therefore, should not be allowed to take the oath.

MR. NOVAK: You don't feel there were any racist overtones to this?

MR. BOND: Oh, certainly I do. I don't think that race was the sole factor involved, but I think——

MR. NOVAK: You do think it was a factor?

MR. BOND: Yes, I do.

MR. NOVAK: Do you think a white man taking your position would have been seated?

MR. BOND: I don't know if a white man took my position whether he would be seated, but I think my employment with what some people consider a militant civil rights group, my race, the statement itself, were all factors involved in the eventual outcome.

MR. NOVAK: Do you feel that your subscribing to the SNCC statement in any way did compromise your loyalty to the United States?

MR. BOND: No, not at all.

MR. NOVAK: Would you fight for your country under any conditions?

MR. BOND: I consider myself a pacifist, if you mean, would I bear arms.

MR. NOVAK: Would you have borne arms in World War II, for example?

MR. BOND: That is sort of a hypothetical question. I don't believe I would.

MR. NOVAK: Then you are not a selective pacifist? There are no conditions under which you would bear arms for your country?

MR. BOND: No.

MR. NOVAK: Would you fight to save your family, your household?

MR. BOND: That again is another hypothetical situation. You know, the usual question put to pacifists is "What would you do if someone began beating your wife?" But no one is beating my wife right now. I think of myself as a pacifist. I believe in non-violence.

MR. NOVAK: Let me ask you a non-hypothetical question: Do you approve of the Deacons for Defense and Justice, which is a Negro group which does bear arms and has had close ties with civil rights groups in the South?

MR. BOND: No, I don't approve of anyone anywhere under any circumstances engaging in violence.

MR. NOVAK: When did you become a pacifist, Mr. Bond?

MR. BOND: I began thinking about pacifism and about non-violence in 1957, when I was a student at a Quaker school in Pennsylvania, and since then, since my involvement in the civil rights movement has become deeper and deeper, the feeling has just increased.

MR. NOVAK: When you first applied for the draft, did you list yourself as a pacifist?

MR. BOND: No, I didn't. The Army told me that they weren't interested in my serving with them.

MR. NOVAK: You did not in any way indicate you were a pacifist at that time?

MR. BOND: No, I simply registered.

MR. NOVAK: Why didn't you?

MR. BOND: After I took my physical examination and after

I had taken the mental examination, I was given a status of 1-Y, which I understand means not to be called except in case of national emergency, and I never believed that my service in the military would be in issue.

MR. ROBINSON: Mr. Bond, you indicated your position on war in general just a moment ago—that you are a pacifist and you believe in non-violence. At the same time when we took it down to the personal level, you indicated you would make a decision on that when and if it happened.

Are you in a sense, then, saying you would support those wars which happened to come up if they go along with your ideas and reject those that you do not agree with?

MR. BOND: No, what I was trying to indicate is that I don't like to answer questions about hypothetical situations because I don't think anyone really knows how he is going to react in a hypothetical situation. I am not a selective pacifist; I don't choose this war over that war. I oppose all wars and I oppose all violence.

MR. ROBINSON: At the same time you indicated when it came down to your family, you would have to wait until that situation took place, although you would oppose all wars in the future as in the past.

MR. BOND: No, that is not what I was saying. I was trying to indicate that, as far as I am concerned, I am a pacifist whether it concerns my family or war in Viet Nam or a war wherever.

MR. ROBINSON: You have been a pacifist for some time, but why didn't you make your position known, as a pacifist, when you were running for office in Georgia, and why didn't you make your views on Viet Nam known during the campaign?

MR. BOND: My views on non-violence were known during the campaign. The question of Viet Nam is not a question that the Georgia House of Representatives, the office that I was aspiring to, addresses itself to. I didn't think it was an issue.

MR. WICKER: Mr. Bond, aside from your general pacifist views, as a thoughtful and aspiring American Negro, do you feel more personal affinity with other aspiring non-white men in Asia and Africa, perhaps, than with the great majority of white Americans?

MR. BOND: I feel an emotional attachment toward Africa and toward colored people, but I don't think that colored people are any better or any worse than white people. I don't feel that because colored people are engaging in a struggle against white people that the colored people must be right.

MR. WICKER: I wasn't suggesting that you were. I was wondering if you felt somehow that across the world, non-white men had a sort of link, a common struggle against white oppression in some places, white majorities elsewhere, and if these links were beginning to be forced more closely

MR. BOND: I don't want to characterize the oppression as white. It unfortunately is in a great many cases, but I don't think it is that case. I think it is the case that colored people have had in a great many instances, a common struggle against some sort of oppression.

MR. WICKER: To be specific, would you see any striking similarity between the civil rights struggle in the United States in which you have been such an active participant and a revolutionary movement like that of the Viet Cong?

MR. BOND: No, I don't see that sort of a similarity. I see a similarity between people—in one case Negroes in the United States, in other cases people who live in Viet Nam—who are struggling. That is one parallel. The other parallel is that Negroes in the United States are struggling against a system of segregation and discrimination and oppression, and the same sort of parallel has been suggested, not by me, as going on in Viet Nam, today.

MR. KAPLOW: Mr. Bond, to follow up what you just said about an affinity of people who are struggling, do you feel that maybe one of the targets of the struggling in Viet Nam not only is what is characterized in this document, which you endorsed and which started this whole thing, from SNCC—not only the United States but also the Communist side? Would you feel that they were also—people were struggling against them?

MR. BOND: The feeling that I have is that people who live in Viet Nam, North and South, are struggling to determine their own destiny in some way or another. The impression I get is that they would like very much to be left alone, not only by the United States but by the Viet Cong as well.

MR. KAPLOW: This document, again, which started all this and which was put out by SNCC, only condemns the United States. It doesn't condemn the North Vietnamese or the Viet Cong or any other group—or the Red Chinese.

MR. BOND: Right. I will condemn them here, but my position in endorsing this document, and I believe, the position of those who drafted it was that we are, after all, Americans who live in this country, and I feel a much greater responsibility toward criticizing or praising the actions of this country than I do toward praising or criticizing the actions of another.

MR. KAPLOW: However, if you make your point that the common bond is struggling peoples, then it doesn't make any difference who is against them, you are against all those who might be oppressing, whether it is an American or Red Chinese or North——

MR. BOND: That is right.

MR. KAPLOW: How else do you equate civil rights with Viet Nam? A lot of the other civil rights groups—for instance, the head of the Atlanta Chapter of NAACP—say that you shouldn't equate the two.

MR. BOND: I equate it. I think the opposition to the war in Vietnam in this country among a great many people is moral opposition. That is, it is not political opposition; it is opposition of people who feel that war is wrong. It is opposition of people who feel that that particular war is wrong on a moral ground. I think that is the same sort of opposition that the civil rights movement has been engaged in against segregation. It has been moral opposition to segregation as well as political and physical opposition to segregation.

MR. KAPLOW: Again referring back to this document which is sort of becoming, I guess, the Bible for my questioning, anyway, but you say the United States in effect has not done enough or moved quickly enough on civil rights, and you mentioned a couple of laws. You don't feel that legislation in '57 or, I think, '61, '64 and '65 and a whole string of court rulings all favoring desegregation marks progress against segregation?

MR. BOND: No, the document doesn't say there hasn't been progress. It does say that there has not been, in our opinion, enough progress.

MR. KAPLOW: I think that it is stronger than that. I can't read it here, now, but I think it implies that the United States has fallen short of carrying out its commitment. Is that fair?

MR. BOND: Yes, that is fair. That is my belief.

MR. SCHERER: Mr. Bond, I am wondering what you and your friends see as a central issue here in your difficulties with the legislature. Is it perhaps the right to dissent?

MR. BOND: I think it is two important issues. First, it is certainly the right to free speech, the right of dissent, the right to voice an opinion that may be unpopular, but I think a second and equally as important an issue is the right of people—in this case, my constituents—to be represented by someone they chose, their right to make a free choice in a free election, to choose someone to represent them. I think in this instance the Georgia House of Representatives has denied them that right.

MR. SCHERER: How many of your constituents feel the same way you do about Viet Nam, do you know?

MR. BOND: Since this became an issue, I tried to talk with as many as I could, and I've got—or I had, 25,000 constituents, men, women and children, about 6,000 registered voters. In three days, I must have talked to—not very many people, about 200 or 250 at the most, and their opinions generally were in agreement with this statement and in agreement with my right to express myself on any issue that I saw.

In fact, I might say that some of them—I don't like to use this word, but some of them had opinions about the war in Viet Nam that were more extreme than this document.

MR. SCHERER: You think most of the 6,000 would support this statement?

MR. BOND: I don't know if they would or not. I know that all of those that I talked to did.

MR. NOVAK: Mr. Bond, I would like to get into some of the wording of this statement because it is interesting that you mention there could be a position a little more extreme. For example, it says, "We maintain that our country's crusade to preserve freedom in the world is a hypocritcal mask behind which it squashes liberation movements."

What is a liberation movement?

MR. BOND: I think that I have to agree with Senator Young, I think it was, who said that the struggle in Viet Nam was a civil war.

MR. NOVAK: Is the Viet Cong a liberation movement, Mr. Bond?

MR. BOND: I don't know what the Viet Cong are. I have the impression that they are not what I would call a liberation movement.

MR. NOVAK: What liberation movements are we squashing according to the SNCC statement?

MR. BOND: According to this statement and according to my beliefs, the liberation movement that is being squashed in that particular instance is the struggle of people who live in North and South Viet Nam and who want self-determination, who want to rule themselves.

MR. NOVAK: Do you mean this is not the Viet Cong that we are fighting in Viet Nam? Are we fighting someone else beside the Viet Cong?

MR. BOND: There are a lot of differences of opinion about who is fighting and whether it is infiltrators from the North or whether it is citizens of the South—whether it is a civil war.

MR. NOVAK: You don't think it is a Communist-led operation, the Viet Cong?

MR. BOND: I don't know if it is.

MR. NOVAK: You have made several statements about Viet Nam, Mr. Bond. Have you made any study of the subject?

MR. BOND: I have tried to learn as much about it as I can.

MR. NOVAK: And you don't know whether the Viet Cong is a Communist movement or not?

MR. BOND: No, all the information that I get is that it is. What I am trying to say, if you will give me a second, is that by a liberation movement I mean—and I take this statement to mean—the legitimate aspirations of the people who live in North and South Viet Nam, who, it seems to me, want only to determine their own destiny.

MR. NOVAK: In the Communist parlance, isn't the liberation movement part of the terminology of wars of liberation which have been proclaimed by Peking?

MR. BOND: That may be their analysis of that term. It is not mine.

MR. NOVAK: I just want to ask you another thing in this statement: "We believe the U.S. Government has been deceptive in its claim of concern for the freedom of the Vietnamese people just as the government has been deceptive in claiming concern for the freedom of colored people."

Do you think the United States government has been deceptive in claiming freedom for colored people in the United States? Claiming concern for freedom?

MR. BOND: Concern?

MR. NOVAK: I am quoting from the SNCC statement: "The government has been deceptive in claiming concern for the freedom of colored people."

MR. BOND: Right. I do. I don't think, as I said a few minutes ago, that the government of this country has done as much as it might, has gone as far as it might.

MR. NOVAK: But that is deceptive?

MR. BOND: In my opinion, it is.

MR. NOVAK: They have sought to deceive the people on their concern for the colored people, then, you feel?

MR. BOND: Yes, I do.

MR. ROBINSON: Mr. Bond, you indicated that you had not counseled the burning of draft cards, and you also said you wouldn't burn yours. Do I take it from this statement you're saying that you did not counsel individuals in this country to avoid the draft?

MR. BOND: No. What this statement says and what I have said is that young Americans, young American men who are unwilling to go into the Army, to enter into military service, should seek legal alternatives to the draft, to military service. And in addition we are suggesting in this statement that those alternatives be enlarged to include work in the civil rights movement or work with human relations organizations.

MR. ROBINSON: But you are asking that they go outside of this present area?

MR. BOND: No, we are asking—this was a public statement thrown out to the public. And last weekend, I met with Congressmen, here, and asked them the same sort of thing.

We are asking that draft boards or the Congress or whoever is the determiner make it possible for young men who are unwilling to go into the Army to have legal and valid alternatives to that service.

MR. ROBINSON: In your statement, you said, "We are in sympathy——" or in SNCC's statement—"We are in sympathy with and support the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft which would compel them to contribute their lives to United States aggression in Viet Nam."

At another point you urged all Americans to seek an alternative. In effect aren't you encouraging individuals throughout the country to avoid the draft?

MR. BOND: I think if you take the statement as a whole and not section by section that it says that we believe work in the civil rights movement and other human relations organizations is a valid alternative to the draft. We urge all Americans to seek this alternative.

MR. ROBINSON: Just one more thing. You indicated that you admired those individuals who burned their draft cards. Yet you said you wouldn't burn yours. Why wouldn't you?

MR. BOND: Let me say what I said first. I said I admired the courage of people who burned their draft cards, because I understand, I think, why they do it, and I admire them for doing it, knowing that they face very heavy penalties, five years in jail, a fine of $5,000 and if they are in public office they might be expelled. I wouldn't burn mine, because it is against the law to burn mine.

MR. WICKER: Do you think there is any likelihood that the organized Negro movement in America, the several organizations like your own, will become an allied and integral part of the so-called peace movement opposing the Vietnamese war?

MR. BOND: If you mean by allied and integral part that we are about to stop the work that we are engaging in now and become a peace organization as opposed to a civil rights organization, no. I do think that what is going to happen is that more and more members of the individual organizations that make up the civil rights movement—and perhaps more organizations, are going to take a public stand on peace, on war and probably on the war in Vietnam.

MR. WICKER: You feel in short that the civil rights movement as such is becoming—will be devoting a larger share of its attention than it has to issues like that in Viet Nam? Current issues in Viet Nam?

MR. BOND: Right, but I don't by any means mean to suggest that we are about to drop the things that we are doing now.

MR. WICKER: Would you think that an escalation of the war in any sense—that is, if the war becomes a much hotter war, a great deal more fighting—would you think that this would accelerate this trend that you now see?

MR. BOND: I think so. People in the civil rights movement are worried about the cost of that war for one thing and what the cost of that war is going to mean to the war on poverty in this country, what it is going to mean to social services in this country. I think they are concerned about it, and any escalation I think will increase the concern of people here.

MR. WICKER: Looked at in terms of American politics, if this happens, does it seem to you that a long continuation of the war and perhaps a step-up of the level of the war, would this trend be likely to drive members of the Negro organizations not only into the peace movement but out of the Democratic Party, which, after all, is responsible for the war?

MR. BOND: I like to think I am in the Democratic Party. I ran as a Democrat. I don't think it will have that effect. I don't think that people in the civil rights movement—as I said before—are going to just drop their other work, but I do think that there is going to be increasing participation by people in the civil rights movement in anti-war movements.

MR. KAPLOW: Could you not conceive, then, Mr. Bond, that possibly by becoming active in something else you might dilute the impact of your primary purpose, which was desegregation?

MR. BOND: I can see that, but I don't think it will happen. That is the argument that people have argued against my taking a stand and against SNCC taking a stand and against other people in the civil rights movement who have taken a stand.

MR. KAPLOW: Of the major civil rights organizations, major half-dozen or so, isn't SNCC the only one that has done that, and many of the leaders in respect to your case say, yes, you should have been seated but they disagree with your position on Viet Nam and don't think it should become an issue?

MR. BOND: Right. A great many people have said that.

SNCC is, I believe, the only organization that has taken a public stand on the war in Viet Nam. Dr. Martin Luther King has taken a public stand oposing the war in Viet Nam. James Farmer, when he was executive secretary of CORE took a position as a private citizen, he said, against the war in Viet Nam.

MR. KAPLOW: I would like to go a little bit more into this business of SNCC as a civil rights group. You sort of put the word "militant" in quotes a few minutes ago when you talked about that adjective for SNCC.

Jim Foreman, who is one of your associates in SNCC, is quoted as calling nine other Negro legislators in the Georgia Legislature "Uncle Toms." Do you know what he meant by that or what he was thinking and do you agree?

MR. BOND: No, I don't agree that the other nine——

MR. KAPLOW: Did he say that, as far as you know?

MR. BOND: I read it in the paper. I wasn't there when he was supposed to have said it. I assume that he did. I don't agree with that characterization.

MR. KAPLOW: What do you think about it?

MR. BOND: About the other nine Negroes in the Georgia House?

MR. KAPLOW: Yes.

MR. BOND: Some of them are friends of mine. Some of them I don't know too well. Most of them made some effort in behalf of my being seated, and I am very appreciative of it.

MR. KAPLOW: Do you feel that they are not making strong enough efforts for desegregation?

MR. BOND: I don't expect everyone in the country to run around——

MR. KAPLOW: Did you mean they are not making——

MR. BOND: Maybe you better ask me that again.

MR. KAPLOW: Do you feel that they are making strong enough efforts for desegregation?

MR. BOND: Yes, I do.

MR. SCHERER: Mr. Bond, you are out of the Legislature, now. What are your plans for getting back in?

MR. BOND: I have filed a suit with two of my constituents, a woman named Mrs. Keyes and Dr. Martin Luther King, against the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, which will probably be decided sometime in the next three weeks. I am also an announced candidate but not a qualified candidate for a special election that comes up on February 23, to fill the vacancy created when my seat was empty, and beyond that—those are the only things I am doing.

MR. SCHERER: Do you plan to take this all the way to the Supreme Court, if necessary?

MR. BOND: If I don't get relief from the three-judge Federal panel, the next step is the Supreme Court, and we will go there.

MR. NOVAK: Mr. Bond, your organization, SNCC, is trying to build an all-black political organization in central Alabama which will run under the symbol of the black panther. Do you feel that at a time when the Democratic Party, the white Democratic Party of Alabama has dropped the White Supremacy slogan and is trying to provide an entry for Negroes, this is intelligent politics?

MR. BOND: It is not for me to say. I think it is, but I think the decision in this case rests with those particular people who live in Lowndes County. They are interested in getting some of the benefits from their city and county government, and they see this as one of the means of getting them, electing their representatives to posts in that government. They don't intend by any means to take over, but they are going to run, I think, four candidates in the upcoming primary.

MR. SCHERER: Less than a minute.

MR. KAPLOW: Mr. Bond, what would you expect the white leadership to do to fulfill what you conceive to be their obligation to the Negro in equality? Now? What more?

MR. BOND: I don't know if we have enough time for that, but generally I think Negroes in this country want the things that white people have as a matter of course, the right to a decent living, the right to——

MR. KAPLOW: Aren't efforts being made to promote that now by the white leadership of this country?

MR. BOND: Certainly they are.

MR. WICKER: What are the prospects you now see, Mr. Bond, for Negroes remaining within the established two-party system?

MR. SCHERER: Sorry, time's up. We will save that for the next time.

136th DISTRICT NEWS

File
Julian Bond

Vol 1, #4 March 27, 1966 Atlanta, Ga.

I hope that the next issue of the 136th DISTRICT NEWSLETTER will reach you in less time than this one has.

First, a few words about how the suit is going. On March 16, we filed suit in the United States Supreme Court. We asked the court to review the February 10 decision by the three-judge federal court in Atlanta which voted 2 to 1 to allow the Georgia House of Representatives to refuse to seat me. We also asked the court to consider whether my right to free speech was violated and whether you - the voters of the 136th District - were denied your right to vote and to be represented. The suit said I was denied my seat - and you were denied your right to vote and to be represented - only because of my "public statements on matters of national concern."

No one knows when a ruling will come down from the court.

In events closer to home, Speaker of the House George T. Smith has set April 4th as the day a special committee of the House will decide whether I am qualified to take the oath of office after winning the February 23 election. Smith had called the meeting for March 21, but put it off after a suit was filed by lawyers asking the court to order the Georgia House of Representatives to finish reapportioning itself.

So, several things may happen:

- the United States Supreme Court may refuse to hear the case, or:
- they may hear it, and say the Georgia court was right, or:
- they may say the Georgia court was wrong, and order Georgia to give us the seat, or:
- they may not rule until after the elections this fall, or:
- the special committee may rule I cannot take the seat, or"
- they may rule I can.

In news closer to home, Mr. Willie Williams and Mr. Sam Martin, both of Markham Street, are continuing their fight to challenge the Georgia law that says tenants who don't want to be evicted must post a bond. They say the law hurst poor people, who can't afford to post a bond. Two Markham Street families are living in tents now, and someone tried to kill Mr. Williams on the night of March 22.

In Washington, Representative Adam Clayton Powell says he will push for a minimum wage of $1.60 a hour. We should make sure that all of the men who run for the United States House of Representative from Atlanta support this idea before we vote for them this fall.

During a recent session of housing court in Atlanta, eleven slum landlords - including some Negroes - were fined a total of $560, but $207 was suspended. This means the landlords were fined approximately $55 each, and that almost half of that was suspended. This means that men and women who make a good living from slum houses don't have to worry about going to jail or paying big fines, and therefore don't feel they have to fix up their houses.

One out of every nine American men between 10 and 29 years old is a Negro. But two out of every nine American men killed inViet Nam last year were Negroes. Although Negroes make up only 14% of the Army force in Viet Nam, 22% of those killed last year were Negroes. The Army says this is because Negroes are very brave, but I think there are other reasons. What do you think?

If you live in John Eagon, John Hope or University Homes, here are some figures that you might be interested in. Average rent in public housing is $35.96 a month. Average income per family in public housing is $2,509 a year. There are 8,145 units in all of Atlanta's public housing, with 30,269 people living in

I am enclosing in this newsletter a copy of what I said - and the questions I was asked - on MEET THE PRESS.

Dear Friend:

I am writing to let you know that in a few days I will qualify to run for re-election to the Georgia House of Representatives in the September 13th Democratic primary.

I am letting you know in advance because you were one of the many who helped so much during the last campaign, and because I want to appeal to you for the same sort of help.

This campaign will be a difficult one. There will be other candidates with large sums of money running against us. There will be people telling you - and the voters of the 136th District - that the Georgia House of Representatives will never let me take office.

I am sure, however, that if we win this election you will have representation in your state government. I am sure because my case will be heard in a few months by the United States Supreme Court. I am sure because every legal opinion that I can gather indicates to us that the nation's highest court will rule in our favor. I am sure because the recent action of the Rules Committee of the House in refusing to seat me a second time is a temporary one, and must be approved or rejected by the entire House in January, 1967. And I am sure because I don't think you will let the Georgia House of Representatives make up your mind about who will represent you.

The issues in this coming campaign will be the same as they were last year. I will campaign on a platform and program of real representation for all of the people of the 136th District. I believe now - as I did then - that the people must decide what their representatives must do.

I am writing you now because I want to hear from each of you. I want to know if I can count on your support. I want to know if you will involve yourself in politics and make politics work for you.

I want you to tell me what you think the problems are that your representative must deal with. Please let me hear from you. I hope to contact each of you personally in the weeks ahead.

Sincerely,

Julian Bond

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION, Wednesday, July 6, 1966

July 25 Is the Last Day To Register, Voters Told

An appeal for more voter registration during July has been made by Travis Stewart, executive director of the State Democratic party.

He pointed out that July 25 is the last day on which a person may register in order to be qualified to vote in the Sept. 14 primaries.

"Special emphasis," he said, "is being placed upon the fact that Georgia's young people occupy a unique position in that they may vote at age 18.

"Georgia is one of a few states in the nation which accord this privilege to its younger citizens and we are encouraging them to take full advantage of this opportunity by registering and voting, and otherwise fully participating in politics and government."

Stewart added that the deadline for voter registration to participate in the November general election is Sept. 19.

It's worth a try, isn't it?

WOULD YOU LET SOMEONE YOU DIDN'T KNOW:

- tell you where you can live?
- tell you where you can work, and how much money you will be paid?
- decide what kind of education your children will have?
- decide if your street will be paved, or if your garbage will be picked up?
- make laws and rules without asking how you feel?
- spend your tax dollars without asking how you want it spent?

THAT'S EXACTLY WHAT YOU ARE DOING, EVERY ELECTION DAY, IF YOU AREN'T REGISTERED TO VOTE. YOU TAKE A CHANCE WITH YOUR LIFE, A CHANCE THAT SOMEONE ELSE KNOWS WHAT YOU WANT.

IF YOU THINK "SOMEONE ELSE" HAS BEEN DOING A GOOD JOB, DON'T WORRY. BUT IF YOU THINK THINGS COULD BE A LITTLE BETTER, THEN YOU'D BETTER STOP LETTING "SOMEONE ELSE" DO YOUR THINKING FOR YOU.

It's easy to register to vote. You don't have to know how to read or write!

Dear Friend:

I want to begin by thanking you for your response to my last letter to you.

I also want to tell you what the recent ruling by the United States Supreme Court in our case means.

Every letter and call that I received from the people that the last letter was sent to encouraged me to run again. I hope that kind of support will continue and that it can be transalated into action for the election and the September 13 Democratic Primary, so that the people of the 136th District will have a real chance to elect their own representative, instead of having the legislature telling us who we can and who we can't vote for.

The United States Supreme Court ruled on June 20, 1966 that they would hear the suit filed by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Mrs. Arel Keyes and myself.

They agreed to hear arguments in the case sometime after their new session starts on October 3, 1966.

The state of Georgia had said the United States Supreme Court didn't have any right to hear this case. By agreeing to hear the arguments, the Supreme Court s ems to be saying they do have that right.

We are beginning to knock on doors again, and want to attend meetings of any social, civic or savings club or any other meeting that takes place in the 136th District. If any of you know about any such meetings, I wish you would call me at:

753-6867 (my home)

688-0331 (at work)

In the meantime, I hope you can begin to tell everyone you see and talk to about the campaign. Remind them of the date of the election - September 13, 1966 - and urge them to vote and to work to re-elect Julian Bond.

Sincerely,

Julian Bond

5-Phase Bill On Civil Rights Due Today

WASHINGTON, March 13 (AP)—Six senators plan to introduce Tuesday a series of bills aimed at ending discrimination in schools, housing, voting and other areas.

The three Democrats and three Republicans said in a joint statement Monday that the bills would carry out all of the 1961 recommendations of the Civil Rights Commission.

They noted also that the commission had recommended executive as well as legislative action, and they urged President Kennedy to take steps against discrimination in areas where he already has the authority, such as federally aided housing.

* * *

ISSUING THE statement were Sens. Jacob K. Javits, R-N.Y., Kenneth B. Keating, R-N.Y., Joseph S. Clark, D-Pa., Hugh Scott, R-Pa., Paul H. Douglas, D-Ill., and Philip A. Hart, D-Mich.

Here is the legislation for five general areas:

VOTING RIGHTS (Keating)—Bills to wipe out property qualifications for voting, substituting six years of grade school education for literacy qualifications, and prohibiting arbitrary denials of the right to register and vote.

EDUCATION (Javits)—Bills requiring school boards to adopt desegregation plans within 180 days if their schools are segregated, authorizing the attorney general to enforce desegregation by injunction, and authorizing financial aid for districts that desegregate.

EMPLOYMENT (Clark)—Bills establishing a commission to enforce equal job opportunities in federal employment and in employment under government contracts or aided by federal funds; and charging unions with unfair labor practices if they discriminate against members on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin.

HOUSING (Scott)—Bills to ban discrimination in mortgage loan, urban renewal and highway clearance programs.

Defendants

Before TUTTLE and BELL, Circuit Judges, and MORGAN, District Judge.

BELL, Circuit Judge and MORGAN, District Judge:

OPINION AND ORDER

Mr. Bond, one of the plaintiffs in this matter and a Negro, was refused his seat as a member of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Georgia. He was a Representative-elect, having been duly elected by the voters of House District No. 136 for the session of the General Assembly commencing January 10, 1966. This was a special election for a one year term made necessary by the reapportionment decision of this court. Toombs v. Fortson, N.D., Ga., 1965, 241 F.Supp. 65.

On the first day of the session, at which time Mr. Bond and other members of the House were to take the oath of office, Mr. Bond was asked to step aside because of challenges to his qualifications having been filed by seventy-five of the two-hundred-five members of the House. After the other members were sworn, including seven Negro representatives, petitions protesting the seating of Representative-Elect Bond were referred by the Speaker of the House to a special committee designated to hear the contest. This committee, after a hearing, recommended that he not be seated. This recommendation was accepted by the House and he was denied his seat by a vote of one hundred eighty-four to twelve.

Dr. King and Mrs. Keyes, the other plaintiffs, seek along with Mr. Bond to represent the citizens and voters of House District No. 136 as a class, and it is affirmatively alleged that they are Negro citizens of House District No. 136 and that they are registered voters. They allege that there are common questions of law and fact affecting the civil rights of Negroes to vote and to have members of their race represent them in the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia. It is undisputed that Dr. King and Mrs. Keyes are residents of the district, but it is also undisputed that Dr. King is not registered to vote in the district but in the House District No. 132.

The defendants are the Speaker of the House, the Speaker Pro-Tem, several members of the House representing the membership, certain officers of the House, and the Secretary of State of the State of Georgia. Jurisdiction for declaratory and injunctive relief is asserted under 28 USCA, §§ 1331, 1343(3), 1343(4), and 2201; and 42 USCA, §§ 1971(d), 1983, and 1988. Three-Judge District Court jurisdiction was premised on 28 USCA, § 2281 by a claim that the provision of the Georgia Constitution which permits the members of the House to judge the qualifications of its members, and House Rule 61 which embodies the same provision are unconstitutionally vague, or were unconstitutionally administered with respect to Mr. Bond.

The additional causes of action set forth in the complaint were refined by briefs into claims that Mr. Bond was barred from membership because he was a Negro; that the action of the House denied him his First Amendment right to free speech; that he was denied procedural due process as guaranteed by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; that he was denied substantive due process in that there was no rational basis for the action of the House; that the House resolution barring Mr. Bond constituted an ex post facto law and a bill of attainder; and that the House action deprived the residents of the House District No. 136 of a republican form of government, equal protection of the law under the Fourteenth Amendment, and the right as Negroes under the Fifteenth Amendment to vote. The prayer is that defendants be enjoined from excluding Mr. Bond from membership in the House.

The defendants, by motion, have denied the jurisdiction of the court. Additionally, in the alternative, they have moved to dismiss Dr. King and Mrs. Keyes as plaintiffs. They have also answered the complaint. It was stipulated that a final judgment might be rendered on the pleadings, the stipulated facts and such other evidence as was introduced on the hearing of this matter. We thus proceed to final disposition.

The facts which gave rise to the challenge to Mr. Bond stem from a statement issued on January 6, 1966 by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, an organization active in the civil rights field. Mr. Bond is and was Communications Director of this organization. After the statement was issued, Mr. Bond, upon inquiry, advised the news media that he supported the statement in its entirety. He added that he admired the courage of persons who burned their draft cards; that he was a pacifist who was eager and anxious to encourage people not to participate in the war in Viet Nam for any reason that they might choose; and said that as a second class citizen he did not feel that he should be required to support the war in Viet Nam.

The SNNC statement follows in full:

> "The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has a right and a responsibility to dissent with United States foreign policy on an issue when it sees fit. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee now states its opposition to United States' involvement in Viet Nam on these grounds:
>
> "We believe the United States government has been deceptive in its claims of concern for freedom of the Vietnamese people, just as the government has been deceptive in claiming concern for the freedom of colored people in such other countries as the Dominican Republic, the Congo, South Africa, Rhodesia and in the United States itself.
> "We, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, have been involved in the black people's struggle for liberation and self-determination in this country for the past five years. Our work, particularly in the South, has taught us that the United States government has never guaranteed the freedom of oppressed citizens, and is not yet truly determined to end the rule of terror and oppression within its own borders.

"We ourselves have often been victims of violence and confinement executed by United States government officials. We recall the numerous persons who have been murdered in the South because of their efforts to secure their civil and human rights, and whose murderers have been allowed to escape penalty for their crimes.

"The murder of Samuel Young in Tuskegee, Ala., is no different than the murder of peasants in Viet Nam, for both Young and the Vietnamese sought, and are seeking, to secure the rights guaranteed them by law. In each case the United States government bears a great part of the responsibility for these deaths.

"Samuel Young was murdered because United States law is not being enforced. Vietnamese are murdered because the United States is pursuing an aggressive policy in violation of international law. The United States is no respecter of persons or law when such persons or laws run counter to its needs and desires.

"We recall the indifference, suspicion and outright hostility with which our reports of violence have been met in the past by government officials.

"We know that for the most part, elections in this country, in the North as well as the South, are not free. We have seen that the 1965 Voting Rights Act and the 1964 Civil Rights Act have not yet been implemented with full federal power and sincerity.

"We question, then, the ability and even the desire of the United States government to guarantee free elections abroad. We maintain that our country's cry of 'preserve freedom in the world' is a hypcritical mask behind which it squashes liberation movements which are not bound, and refuse to be bound, by the expediencies of United States cold war policies.

"We are in sympathy with, and support, the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft which would compel them to contribute their lives to United States agression in Viet Nam in the name of the 'freedom' we find so false in this country.

"We recoil with horror at the inconsistency of a supposedly 'free' society where responsibility to freedom is equated with the responsibility to lend oneself to military aggression. We take note of the fact that 16 percent of the draftees from this country are Negroes called on to stifle the liberation of Viet Nam, to preserve a 'democrary' which does not exist for them at home.

"We ask, where is the draft for the freedom fight in the United States?

"We therefore encourage those Americans who prefer to use their energy in building democratic forms within this country. We believe that work in the civil rights movement and with other human relations organizations is a valid alternative to the draft. We urge all Americans to seek this alternative, knowing full well that it may cost them lives - as painfully as in Viet Nam."

On the same day a newspaper reporter asked Mr. Bond for his views on the subject of the burning of draft cards. He stated that he would not burn his own but admired the courage of those who did.

During a taped interview with a representative of the media, Mr. Bond, after endorsing the SNCC statement was asked why he endorsed it, and his answer was as follows:

"Why, I endorse it, first, because I like to think of myself as a pacifist and one who opposes that war and any other war and eager and anxious to encourage people not to participate in it for any reason that they choose; and secondly, I agree with this statement because of the reason set forth in it - because I think it is sorta hypocritical for us to maintain that we are fighting for liberty in other places and we are not guaranteeing liberty to citizens inside the continental United States."

When asked if he thought his views were at variance with the duties that might be required of him as a Representative in the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, Mr. Bond replied:

"Well, I think that the fact that the United States Government fights a war in Viet Nam, I don't think that I as a second class citizen of the United States have a requirement to support that war. I think my responsibility is to oppose things that I think are wrong if they are in Viet Nam or New York, or Chicago, or Atlanta, or wherever."

These facts were introduced before the House committee hearing the challenge. Mr. Bond was represented by counsel at the hearing and testified. He reaffirmed his adherence to all of these statements at the hearing and stated that they were still his views. There was no evidence then nor at the hearing before this court that Mr. Bond had receded in any way from his views. However, by way of explanation, he did state to the House committee that he had never suggested or advocated that anyone burn his draft card. He stated his willingness and desire to take the prescribed oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the State of Georgia.

The petitions challenging Mr. Bond which were before the special committee of the House contain several grounds, including the contention that Mr. Bond's actions and statements gave aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, and also violated the Selective Service laws, 50 App., USCA, § 462(a) and (b), and tended to bring discredit and disrespect on the House of Representatives.

The challenge was also on the basis that the statements and views of Mr. Bond disqualified him to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of Georgia as is required of a member of the House of Representatives. The theory was that Mr. Bond's statements were so repugnant to and inconsistent with his oath as to make it apparent that he could not honestly take the oath. This theory presents the central issue in the case.

PENDING MOTIONS

Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter. Their view is that the determination of the qualifications of a member of the State House of Representatives is a matter which state law vests in the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the House of Representatives, and that the federal questions asserted are insubstantial. They urge that the absence of any substantial question concerning deprivation of federally protected rights indicates that the action of the House is not subject to federal judicial review.

The extent of review under the circumstances will be discussed hereinafter under the merits of the controversy. However, we do hold that the court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of the complaint. It could hardly be argued that the House could refuse to seat a member because of his race or for any other reason amounting to an invidious discrimination under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Cf. Baker v. Carr, 1962, 369 U.S. 186, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663. The denial of a seat to a Negro representative-elect would also violate the Fifteenth Amendment. Cf. Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 1960, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110. We think it follows that the court has jurisdiction over a denial of First Amendment rights by the state, and that the federal rights asserted here are not so insubstantial as to warrant our refusing jurisdiction. The motion of the state to dismiss will be overruled and an order may be presented accordingly.

The defendants also have motions pending to strike the plaintiffs King and Keyes on the ground that they do not have such a direct interest in the litigation as would give them standing. They base their standing on an absence of representation in the House because Mr. Bond was deprived of his seat. The Governor has called an election for February 23, 1966 to fill the vacant seat.(1)

It is settled that one seeking to challenge the constitutionality of the statute must show that he has sustained or is in danger of sustaining some immediate direct injury. Liverpool, N.Y. and P. Steamship Company v. Comm. of Emigration, 1885, 113 U.S. 33, 5 S.Ct. 352, 28 L.Ed. 899; Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Mellon, 1923, 262 U.S. 447, 43 S.Ct. 597, 67 L.Ed. 1078. Dr. King and Mrs. Keyes have not ". . . alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues . . ." necessary in determining constitutional questions. Baker v. Carr, supra.

In a case involving the temporary lack of representation because an United States Senator had been denied his seat pending inquiry into his election and qualifications, Barry v. United States, 1929, 279 U.S. 597, 49 S.Ct. 452, 73 L.Ed. 867, the court said:

> "The temporary deprivation of equal representation which results from the refusal of the Senate to seat a member pending inquiry as to his election or qualifications is the necessary consequence of the exercise of a constitutional power, and no more deprives the State of its 'equal suffrage' in the constitutional sense than would a vote of the Senate vacating the seat of a sitting member or a vote of expulsion."

(1) Mr. Bond is a candidate for the vacant seat and is the only candidate. The qualifications closed on February 7, 1966. The General Assembly will adjourn its present session on Friday, February 18, 1966. There will be no other regular session of the General Assembly during the year 1966.

We are of the opinion that plaintiffs King and Keyes do not have such a direct interest in the litigation as would give them standing to bring the complaint. This is particularly so in view of the fact that the complaint of Mr. Bond alone will resolve every conceivable issue. Moreover, Dr. King is not a registered voter in the House District in question. The motion of the state to dismiss as to these two plaintiffs will be granted and an order may be presented accordingly.

THE MERITS

The contention that Mr. Bond was denied his seat because of his race was resolved adversely to him from the bench during the hearing of this matter. To support this contention it was urged that Mr. Bond was a Negro; that SNCC was a militant civil rights organization; and that the question of race was inextricably related to each and every statement forming the basis of the challenge. This logic would create license in the name of race. Furthermore, seven Negroes, as stated, were seated on the same day as representatives. Two served on the special challenge committee at the request of Mr. Bond; two Negro senators appeared before the committee as character witnesses for him; and two of the Negro representatives spoke on the floor of the House for him before the final vote. The charge of racial discrimination and thus of denial of equal protection of the law is without foundation in fact.

This ruling also disposes of any claim that Mr. Bond or the citizens and voters of House District No. 136 have been deprived of any right as Negroes under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or under the Fifteenth Amendment. For the reasons stated on the standing question we reject also the contention that the action of the House denied them a republican form of government. This is not even a justiciable issue. Baker v. Carr, supra.

The substantial issue in the case rests on the guaranty of freedom of speech or to dissent under the First Amendment as that amendment has long been applicable to the states under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Gitlow v. New York, 1925, 268 U.S. 652, 45 S.Ct. 625, 69 L.Ed. 1138; De Jonge v. Oregon, 1937, 299 U.S. 353, 57 S.Ct. 255, 81 L.Ed. 278. But the inquiry does not end simply on the question of deprivation of First Amendment rights per se. Rather the inquiry must be in the context of two fundamental principles of government: separation of powers and state government under our system of federalism. The right of free speech would not long exist absent a government founded on these principles.

James Madison writing in Federalist No. 47 said with respect to the separation of powers doctrine:

> "The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary in the same hands, whether of one, a few or many, and whether heredity, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny."

And from the beginning states have claimed and enjoyed the protection of the separation of powers principle as between their respective branches of government. This, to date, has been a part of our federalism.

Georgia adopted the separation of powers principle in its first Constitution. Art. I, Const. of 1777. McElreath, Constitution of Ga., § 239, p. 229. The Constitution of 1789, Art. I, § XIII, McElreath, supra, § 314, p. 243, provided that each House of the state legislature would be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members and have the power to expel or punish for disorderly behavior. Similar provisions have been included in every other Georgia Constitution. Ga. Const. of 1798, Art. I, § VIII, McElreath, § 364, p. 253; Const. of 1861, Art. II, § IV, Par. I, McElreath, § 484, p. 286, Const. of 1865, Art. II, § IV, Par. I, McElreath, § 585, p. 304; Const. of 1868, Art. III, § IV, Par. I, McElreath, § 709, p. 328; Const. of 1877, Art. III, § VII, Par. I, McElreath, § 882, p. 361.

> "Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members and shall have power to punish them for disorderly behavior, or misconduct, by censure, fine, imprisonment, or expulsion; but no member shall be expelled, except by a vote of two-thirds of the House to which he belongs."

This language is to be compared with Art. I, § 5, Clauses 1 and 2 of the Constitution of the United States:

> "Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, . . ." (Clause 1)

> "Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behavior, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member." (Clause 2)

The Georgia courts have consistently refused to take jurisdiction over controversies having to do with the qualifications of legislators. The Senate or House, as happened to be the case, was deemed to have exclusive jurisdiction under the Georgia Constitution.

Rainey v. Taylor, 1928, 166 Ga. 476, 143 S.E. 383; Fowler v. Bostick, 1959, 99 Ga. App. 428, 108 S.E.2d 720; and Beatty v. Myrick, 1963, 218 Ga. 629, 129 S.E.2d 764. This is the general law in this country. Indeed we believe that there is no case to the contrary, federal or state.

Plaintiff recognizes the separation of powers principle as such on both the federal and state levels. He argues however that it exsits on the state level only insofar as it does not conflict with the Federal Constitution and must therefore give way to First Amendment rights in view of the vertical application of those rights to the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This is a correct statement of the law subject to whatever rights were left by the Fourteenth Amendment to the state legislative branches for control of their internal affairs under our system of federalism. We thus must measure Mr. Bond's freedom to speak in this frame of reference.

Before attempting to resolve this new and substantial constitutional question we must concern ourselves with the threshhold question, not asserted by plaintiffs, of whether the legislature had the power under the state Constitution or laws to bar Mr. Bond. Our distinguished and able Chief Judge is of the firm view that no such power existed. He seems to find the power of expulsion, but limits the power of judging qualifications to those expressed in the Georgia Constitution. We believe this to be a restrictive view, unfounded in recognized authority and not in keeping with our history or the principle of separation of powers.

Judge Story gave the reasons for vesting exclusive jurisdiction in the legislative branch in such cases (Story, Comm. on the Const., Vol. II, § 831, p. 294):

> It is obvious, that a power must be lodged somewhere to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of the members of each house composing the legislature; for otherwise there could be no certainty, as to who were legitimately chosen members, and any intruder, or usurper, might claim a seat, and thus trample upon the rights, and privileges, and liberties of the people. Indeed, elections would become, under such circumstances, a mere mockery; and legislation the exercise of sovereignty by any self-constituted body. The only possible question on such a subject is, as to the body, in which such a power shall be lodged. If lodged in any other, than the legislative body itself, its independence, its purity, and even its existence and action may be destroyed, or put into imminent danger. No other body, but itself, can have the same motives to preserve and perpetuate these attributes; no other body can be so perpetually watchful to guard its own rights and privileges from infringement, to purify and vindicate its own character, and to preserve the rights, and sustain the free choice of its constituents. Accordingly, the power has always been lodged in the legislative body by the uniform practice of England and America."

The Supreme Court in Re Chapman, 1897, 166 U.S. 661, 17 S.Ct. 677, 41 L.Ed. 1154, a case involving a senate investigation of the conduct of some of its members, said:

> "Under the Constitution the Senate of the United States has the power to try impeachments; to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; to determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member; and it necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection."

We believe a state legislative body necessarily possesses this same inherent power of self-protection if the separation of powers doctrine is to have any real meaning on the state level. And self-protection goes to the process of qualifications as well as expulsion.

In Hiss v. Bartett, 1855, 3 Gray 468, 63 Am. Dec. 768, the question concerned the legislative power to expel a member. The Massachusetts Constitution contained no such power but did contain the power to judge returns, elections and qualifications. The court said:

> "The authority to be judge of the returns, elections, and qualifications of its own members, does not limit their power; they are judges in other respects, in all respects."

Art. I, § 5, of the United States Constitution, as noted, provides that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members. Art. I, § 3 provides that no person shall be a representative unless he meets certain age, citizenship and residential requirements. In the Constitutional Convention there was an attempt to set up affirmative qualifications. During the debate on that draft which was later rejected, Mr. Dickinson of Delaware, opposed the formulation because it would be held to be exclusive. He stated that he was "against any recitals of qualifications in the Constitution. It was impossible to make a complete one, and a partial one would, by implication, tie up the hands of the Legislature from supplying omissions." Mr. Wilson of Pennsylvania took the same view, saying: "Besides a partial enumeration of cases will disable the Legislature from disqualifying odius and dangerous characters." (Proceedings in Congressional Record, 80th Congress, First Session, January 3, 1947, Vol. 93, p. 12, Senate debate on whether Senator Bilbo of Mississippi was disqualified.)

By way of a historical precedent, Mr. Bilbo was denied his seat in the United States Senate because, among other reasons, his views regarding the right of Negroes to vote were repugnant to the oath he would be required to take. The Senate did not believe that it was limited to the qualifications expressed in the Constitution.

See Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States, 2nd ed., Vol. I, p. 610, where after discussing in § 340 the subject of qualifications for membership being determined by Congress, the author states:

> "The instances which have been cited make it sufficiently clear that the Senate and House have repeatedly held it to be proper that they should consider whether or not persons should be admitted as Senators or Representatives even though possessing all of the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution for membership and bringing credentials in due form of their election."

In the case of Senator Reed Smoot of Utah who had been seated but whose qualifications to continue as a Senator were questioned, the investigation committee recommended that he be expelled either for reason of his membership in a church that countenanced and encouraged polygamy and united church and state contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, or because he had taken an oath of such a nature and character that he is disqualified from taking the oath of office required of an United States Senator. The question was raised concerning the ability of the Senate to add qualifications other than those enumerated in the Constitution and was answered in the report as follows:

> "If his conduct has been such as to be prejudicial to the welfare of society, of the nation, or its Government, he is regarded as being unfit to perform the important and confidential duties of a Senator, and may be deprived of a seat in the Senate, although he may have done no act of which a court could take cognizance." 1 Hind's Precedents, §§ 481-483.

This situation is analogous to the Georgia Constitution. There is nothing in it which limits qualifications of a legislator to those expressed therein. In point of fact there is at least one disqualification in the Georgia law which is not contained in the Constitution. Ga. Code, § 89-101, § 5, provides:

"The following persons are held and deemed ineligible to hold any civil office, and the existence of any of the following states of facts shall be a sufficient reason for vacating any office held by such person, but the acts of such person, while holding a commission, shall be valid as the acts of an officer de facto, viz:

"Persons of unsound mind, and those who, from advanced age or bodily infirmity, are unfit to discharge the duties of the office to which they are chosen or appointed."

The qualifications and disqualifications of legislators in the Georgia Constitution are not all inclusive. In sum, we find nothing that would compel the House to seat a member if a reasonable basis, within the context of due process of law as we shall next discuss, exists for the denial.

Having assumed jurisdiction, we come then to the main question of whether Mr. Bond was improperly denied his seat, but this question is prefaced by the test to be applied. With respect to the test, we hold that the free speech issue should be resolved in the context of giving effect to the separation of powers principle, and also our system of federalism to the extent that it permits self-government to the states under the supremacy of the Federal Constitution.

There is some authority for such an approach. On the federal level we have some guidance in the case of Barry v. United States, 1929, 279 U.S. 597, 49 S.Ct. 452, 73 L.Ed. 867. That case arose out of the refusal to seat Senator Vare because of alleged corruption in his election. The issue was over whether the District Court could grant relief to a witness who had been arrested by the Senate because he refused to testify at the subsequent inquiry. The Supreme Court pointed out that the Senate was acting within its constitutional powers which were judicial in character and refused relief. It was said:

> "Here the question under consideration concerns the exercise by the Senate of an indubitable power; and if judicial interference can be successfully invoked it can only be upon a clear showing of such arbitrary and improvident use of the power as will constitute a denial of due process of law. That condition we are unable to find in the present case."

On the state level, with respect to state elections and thus giving effect to federalism but in no way involving the separation of powers principle, we begin with Wilson v. North Carolina, 1898, 169 U.S. 586, 18 S.Ct. 435, 42 L.Ed. 865. There the governor suspended a railroad commissioner and refused him a hearing. The Supreme Court refused relief. In Snowden v. Hughes, 1944, 321 U.S. 1, 64 S.Ct. 397, 88 L.Ed. 497, a candidate for the state senate alleged that the State Primary Canvassing Board denied him his rights under the equal protection clause by a willful, malicious and arbitrary refusal through a conspiracy to correctly certify the results of a primary election thereby eliminating him as a candidate. He brought his suit in the District Court under the Civil Rights Act of 1871. The Supreme Court refused relief on the ground that his case did not rise to the level of invidious, purposeful discrimination cognizable under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The applicable rule of the case is to be found in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas, as follows:

> "My disagreement with the majority of the Court is on a narrow ground. I agree that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment should not be distorted to make the federal courts the supervisor of the state elections. That would place the federal judiciary in a position 'to supervise and review the political administration of a state government by its own officials and through its own courts' (Wilson v. North Carolina, 169 US 586, 596, 42 L ed 865, 871, 18 S Ct 435) - matters on which each State has the final say. I also agree that a candidate for public office is not denied the equal protection of the law in the constitutional sense merely because he is the victim of unlawful administration of a state election law. I believe, as the opinion of the Court indicates, that a denial of equal protection of the laws requires an invidious, purposeful discrimination. But I depart from the majority when it denies Snowden the opportunity of showing that he was in fact the victim of such discriminatory action. His complaint seems to me to be adequate to raise the issue. He charges a conspiracy to wilfully, maliciously and arbitrarily refuse to designate him as one of the nominees of the Republican party, that such action was an 'unequal' administration of the Illinois law and a denial to him of the equal protection of the laws, and that the conspiracy had that purpose. . . ."

Snowden v. Hughes, as well as Baker v. Carr, supra, at least teach that there must be a showing of invidious, purposeful discrimination to give rise to relief under the equal protection clause. Here we have the due process clause and First Amendment rights. We think these cases show that some restraint is to be practiced by the courts in considering state political questions concerning particular offices as distinguished from whole systems such as are prevalent in malapportionment, or racial discrimination. If this premise be correct, then there is room for a balance between the separation of powers principle, a system of federalism and individual rights afforded under the federal Constitution.

Being of this view, we conclude that a reasonable test under circumstances such as are presented in this case would be to assume jurisdiction for the purpose of determining whether Mr. Bond was denied due process of law, either procedural or substantive. Notice, an opportunity to be heard, to be represented by counsel, to testify and to offer evidence and to cross-examine adverse witnesses are envisioned in procedural due process. The transcript of the hearing which was held on the challenge to Mr.Bond demonstrates no absence of due process. It is true that there was no subpeona power but no request for an absent witness was made. We reject the contention that procedural or substantive due process was violated by allowing the challengers to vote. A holding to the contrary would do violence to the power to judge qualifications.

As to substantive due process, we conclude that there must be a rational evidentiary basis for the ruling of the House to deny Mr. Bond his seat. The act must not have been arbitrary.

Does the action rest on any evidence which would support the denial? Thompson v. Louisville, 1960, 362 U.S. 199, 80 S.Ct. 624, 4 L.Ed.2d 654; Garner v. Louisiana, 1961, 368 U.S. 157, 82 S.Ct. 248, 7 L.Ed.2d 207.

Mr. Bond's right to speak and to dissent as a private citizen is subject to the limitation that he sought to assume membership in the House. As such he was required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. This is a legitimate requirement. Indeed, the Federal Constitution requires it. Art. VI, § 3. One of the charges against him was that his statements were inconsistent with and repugnant to that oath. Was there any basis for this charge?

The SNCC statement is at war with the national policy of this country: To make certain that every citizen stands equal before the law; to make certain that every citizen has a fair chance to benefit in the freedom and opportunities and bounties of this country; to export these same principles of democracy to the balance of the world wherever and whenever possible, even to the extent of lending military assistance where self-determination is denied in order that those denied may choose freedom if they so desire. A citizen would not violate his oath by objecting to or criticizing this policy or even by calling it deceptive and false as the statement did.

But the statement does not stop with this. It is a call to action based on race; a call alien to the concept of the pluralistic society which makes this nation. It aligns the organization with ". . . colored people in such other countries as the Dominican Republic, the Congo, South Africa, Rhodsia . . ." It refers to its involvement in the black people's struggle for liberation and self-determination . . .". It states that "Vietnamese are murdered because the United States is pursuing an aggressive policy in violation of international law." It alleges that Negroes, referring to American servicemen, are called on to stifle the liberation of Viet Nam.

The call to action, and this is what we find to be a rational basis for the decision which denied Mr. Bond his seat, is that language which states that SNCC supports those men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft. The fact that the last paragraph calls on them to devote their energies to the alternative of working in the civil rights movement in no way avoids the fact that the organization offers support to men who are unwilling to respond to a military draft. Cf. Gara v. United States, 6 Cir., 1949, 178 F.2d 38.

Mr. Bond was careful to affirm this statement. He went further, and he was more than a private citizen; he was an officer and employee of SNCC and was about to become a member of the House of Representatives of Georgia. He stated that he admired the courage of anyone who burned his draft card. He stated that as a pacifist he was eager and anxious to encourage people not to participate in the war in Viet Nam or in any other war for any reason that they choose, and lastly, he stated that, as a second class citizen, he did not think that he had the requirement to support the war in Viet Nam.

The Congress has the obligation under the Federal Constitution for providing for the common defense of this nation. The Selective Service System is a part of that defense. We are committed in Viet Nam. The Congress approved this course in Public Law 88-408, August 10, 1964, wherein the president was empowered to take all necessary measures to repel any armed attack against the forces of the United States and to prevent further aggression from the campaign being waged by the ". . . Communist regime in North Vietnam." This resolution states that the United States ". . . regards as vital to its national interest and to world peace the maintenance of international peace and security in Southeast Asia."

Whether Mr. Bond should have been seated was a question which presented itself to the House of Representatives of Georgia under our system. Whether the wisest course was followed is not for us to say. The judgment of the court is not to be substituted for that of the House. Our function is to determine whether he has been denied some fundamental federal right to which he was otherwise entitled. We find and hold that his statements and affirmation of the SNCC statement as they bore on the functioning of the Selective Service System could reasonably be said to be inconsistent with and repugnant to the oath which he was required to take. This suffices as a rational basis for the action of the House. The fact that the statement was otherwise freighted with racial overtones and was at variance with the established national concept of a country accommodating all nationalities and ethnic groups is a part of the basis of our holding only insofar as it relates to the call not to support the Selective Service System.

The charge that the constitutional provision of Georgia authorizing the House to judge the qualifications of its members and the House rule embodying it are unconstitutionally vague is without merit. It follows from what we have said that neither was unconstitutionally applied to Mr. Bond. It also follows from what we have said that the resolution denying Mr.Bond his seat was not an ex post facto law or a bill of attainder. To so hold in the face of a finding that there was a rational basis for the action of the House would be to destroy the constitutional power of judging qualifications.

All relief is denied and the complaint will be dismissed. Defendants may present a judgment accordingly.

This 10 day of February, 1966.

United States District Judge

JULIAN BOND, ET AL v. JAMES "SLOPPY" FLOYD, ET AL., C.A. NO. 9895 - Three Judge Court

Judge Elbert P. Tuttle dissenting.

TUTTLE, Circuit Judge:

With deference I must dissent. I am convinced that Representative-elect Bond was illegally deprived of his seat in the House of Representatives of Georgia and that this court should so hold.

Julian Bond, the plaintiff in this action, was duly elected by the voters of his General Assembly District No. 136 as their representative in the House of Representatives of the Georgia General Assembly for the session commencing January 1, 1966. This is a one-year session, made necessary by this Court's previous decision requiring a reapportionment of the Georgia State Legislature.

Upon his presenting himself along with the other newly elected members of the House of Representatives, he was asked to step aside because challenges to his qualifications had been filed by some 75 members of the House. After the other members had been duly sworn in, a resolution protesting the seating of Representative-elect Bond was referred by the Speaker of the House to a special committee designated to hear the contest. The committee, after a hearing, recommended that he be not seated. This recommendation was accepted by the House, and he was denied his seat.

Since the first attack that is made is based upon the contention that the House exceeded its authority in voting to reject Bond, we turn first to a consideration of the provisions of the Georgia Constitution dealing with the qualifications and eligibility of members.

Article III, Section VII, Paragraph I, of the Georgia Constitution (§2-1001, Ga. Code Ann.) provides as follows:

"Election, returns, etc.; disorderly conduct. -- East House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members and shall have power to punish them for disorderly behavior, or misconduct, by censure, fine, imprisonment, or expulsion, but no member shall be expelled, except by a vote of two-thirds of the House to which he belongs."

Article III, Section VI, Paragraph I, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia (§2-1801, Ga. Code Ann.) provides as follows:

"Qualifications of representatives. -- The Representatives shall be citizens of the United States who have attained the age of twenty-one years, and who shall have been citizens of this State for two years, and for one year residents of the counties from which elected.

Article II, Section II, Paragraph I, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia (§2-801, Ga. Code Ann.) provides as follows:

"Registration of electors; who disfranchised. -- The General Assembly may provide, from time to time, for the registration of all electors, but the following classes of persons shall not be permitted to register, vote, or hold any office, or appointment of honor, or trust in this State, to-wit: 1st. Those who shall have been convicted in any court of competent jurisdiction of treason against the State, of embezzlement of public funds, malfeasance in office, bribery or larceny, or of any crime involving moral turpitude, punishable by the laws of this State with imprisonment in the penitentiary, unless such persons shall have been pardoned. 2nd. Idiots and insane persons."

Article III, Section IV, Paragraph VI, of the Georgia Constitution (§2-1606, Ga. Code Ann.) provides as follows:

"Eligibility; appointments forbidden. -- No person holding a military commission, or other appointment, or office, having any emolument, or compensation annexed thereto, under this State, or the United States, or either of them except Justices of the Peace and officers of the militia, nor any defaulter for public money, or for any legal taxes required of him shall have a seat in either house; nor shall any Senator, or Representative, after his qualification as such, be elected by the General Assembly, or appointed by the Governor, either with or without the advice and consent of the Senate, to any office or appointment having any emolument annexed thereto, during the time for which he shall have been elected, unless he shall first resign his seat, provided, however, that during the term for which he was elected no Senator or Representative shall be appointed to any civil office which has been created during such term."

Article VII, Section III, Paragraph VI, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia (§2-5606, Ga. Code Ann.) provides as follows:

> "Profit on public money. -- The receiving, directly or indirectly, by any officer of State or county, or member or officer of the General Assembly of any interest, profits or perquisites, arising from the use or loan of public funds in his hands or moneys to be raised through his agency for State or county purposes, shall be deemed a felony, and punishable as may be prescribed by law, a part of which punishment shall be a disqualification from holding office."

Article III, Section IV, Paragraph V, of the Georgia Constitution (§2-1605, Ga. Code Ann.) provides as follows:

> "Oath of members. -- Each senator and Representative, before taking his seat, shall take the following oath, or affirmation, to-wit: 'I will support the Constitution of this State and of the United States, and on all questions and measures which may come before me, I will so conduct myself, as will, in my judgment, be most conducive to the interests and prosperity of this State."

The foregoing provisions of the Georgia Constitution are the only stated qualifications or rules of eligibility contained in the State Constitution touching on the membership in either the Senate or the House of Representatives of the Georgia General Assembly.

Julian Bond was denied the right to take his oath as an elected member of the Georgia House of Representatives by a resolution adopted by the said House on January 10, 1966, which said resolution was in the following language:

> "Relative to the matter of the seating of Representative-Elect Julian Bond; and for other purposes.
>
> "WHEREAS, a special committee created pursuant to H.R.No. 7 which was appointed for the purpose of holding a hearing on petitions challenging and contesting the seating of Representative-Elect Julian Bond of the 136th District has conducted a hearing in said matter; and
> "WHEREAS, said committee has submitted a report in which it is recommended that Representative-Elect Julian Bond not be allowed to take the oath of office as a Representative of the House of Representatives and that he not be seated as a member of the House of Representatives.

"NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES that the report of the aforesaid committee is hereby adopted and the recommendations contained therein shall be followed.

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that Representative-Elect Julian Bond shall not be allowed to take the oath of office as a member of the House of Representatives and that Representative-Elect Julian Bond shall not be seated as a member of the House of Representatives.

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that the Clerk of the House is hereby instructed to immediately transmit a copy of the aforesaid report and a copy of this resolution to the Governor, to the Secretary of State and to Representative-Elect Julian Bond."

The said resolution expressly "adopted" the report of the special committee which was appointed for the purpose of conducting, and did actually conduct, a hearing on the matter of the challenge to the seating of Representative-Elect Bond. The report of the committee follows:

"The Special Committee appointed pursuant to H.R. #7 conducted a hearing on January 10, 1966, beginning at 2:30 o'clock p.m., in the chamber of the House of Representatives, State Capitol, on the matter of petitions filed challenging and contesting the seating of Representative-Elect Julian Bond of the 136th District.

"Based upon testimony and the evidence and documents before this Committee, the Committee recommends that Representative-Elect Julian Bond not be allowed to take the oath of office as a member of the House of Representatives and that he not be seated as a member of the House of Representatives.

"This 10th day of January 1966."

The contest which was thus submitted to the special committee, and thereafter decided by the House, resulted from charges and specifications filed by certain members of the House of Representatives in two separate petitions which, in essential part, are as follows:

PETITION I

"COUNT I

"The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, an organization and association of which Representative-Elect Julian Bond is a member, agent, and publicity director, has caused to be made certain statements concerning the position of the United States in the Viet Nam conflict, a copy thereof being attached hereto, marked Exhibit A and by reference made a part hereof, and the said Representative-Elect Julian Bond did publicly endorse, approve and confirm said statement.

"COUNT II

"Said representative-elect has said that he admires the courage of those persons who burn their draft cards.

"The actions and statements of said representative-elect show that he does not and will not support the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Georgia, as required by law (Constitution of Georgia, Article III, Section IV, Paragraph V (Code §2-1605)); Constitution of the United States, Article VI, Section 3.

2.

"By said actions and statements, said representative-elect adheres to the enemies of the United States and of the State of Georgia, contrary to the Constitution of Georgia (Article I, Section II, Paragraph II) and of the United States (Article III, Section 3, Cl. 1).

3.

"By said actions and statements, said representative-elect gives aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States and of the State of Georgia, contrary to the Constitution of Georgia (Article I, Section II, Paragraph II) and of the United States (Article III, Section 3, Cl. 1).

4.

"Said actions and statements constitute a violation of the United States Code, Title 50, §462(a).

5.

"Said actions and statements constitute a violation of the United States Code, Title 50, §462(b), as amended.

6.

"The statements referred to above are reprehensible and are such as tend to bring discredit to and disrespect of the House of Representatives and constitute actions on the part of Representative-Elect Julian Bond sufficient to prevent him from being seated as a member of the House of Representatives.

7.

"Such actions and statements show that he is unqualified and ineligible to be a member of the House of Representatives."

EXHIBIT A TO PETITION I

"The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has a right and a responsibility to dissent with United States foreign policy on an issue when it sees fit. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee now states its opposition to United States' involvement in Viet Nam on these grounds:

"We believe the United States government has been deceptive in its claims of concern for freedom of the Vietnamese people, just as the government has been deceptive in claiming concern for the freedom of colored people in such other countries as the Dominican Republic, the Congo, South Africa, Rhodesia and in the United States itself.

"We, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, have been involved in the black people's struggle for liberation and self-determination in this country for the past five years. Our work, particularly in the South, has taught us that the United States government has never guaranteed the freedom of oppressed citizens, and is not yet truly determined to end the rule of terror and oppression within its own borders.

"We ourselves have often been victims of violence and confinement executed by United States government officials. We recall the numerous persons who have been murdered in the South because of their efforts to secure their civil and human rights, and whose murderers have been allowed to escape penalty for their crimes.

"The murder of Samuel Young in Tuskegee, Ala., is no different than the murder of peasants in Viet Nam, for both Young and the Vietnamese sought, and are seeking, to secure the rights guaranteed them by law. In each case the United States government bears a great part of the responsibility for these deaths.

"Samuel Young was murdered because United States law is not being enforced. Vietnamese are murdered because the United States is pursuing an aggressive policy in violation of international law. The United States is no respecter of persons or law when such persons or laws run counter to its needs and desires.

"We recall the indifference, suspicion and outright hostility with which our reports of violence have been met in the past by government officials.

"We know that for the most part, elections in this country, in the North as well as the South, are not free. We have seen that the 1965 Voting Rights Act and the 1964 Civil Rights Act have not yet been implemented with full federal power and sincerity.

"We question, then, the ability and even the desire of the United States government to guarantee free elections abroad. We maintain that our country's cry of preserve freedom in the world' is a hypcritical mask behind which it squashes liberation movements which are not bound, and refuse to be bound, by the expediencies of United States cold war policies.

"We are in sympathy with, and support, the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft which would compel them to contribute their lives to United States aggression in Viet Nam in the name of the 'freedom' we find so false in this country.

"We recoil with horror at the inconsistency of a supposedly 'free' society where responsibility to freedom is equated with the responsibility to lend oneself to military aggression. We take note of the fact that 16 percent of the draftees from this country are Negroes called on to stifle the liberation of Viet Nam, to preserve a "democracy" which does not exist for them at home.

"We ask, where is the draft for the freedom fight in the United States?

"We therefore encourage those Americans who prefer to use their energy in building democratic forms within this country. We believe that work in the civil rights movement and with other human relations organizations is a valid alternative to the draft. We urge all Americans to seek this alternative, knowing full well that it may cost them lives -- as painfully as in Viet Nam."

PETITION II

"(1) That the Constitution of Georgia, Article III, Section VII, Paragraph 1 provides that each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members,

"(2) That the Constitution of Georgia, Article III, Section IV, Paragraph 5, specifically requires each senator and representative, before taking their seat, to take the following oath or affirmation, to-wit:

> 'I will support the Constitution of this State and of the United States, and on all questions and measures which may come before me, I will so conduct my self, as will, in my judgment, be most conducive to the interest and prosperity of this State.'

"That the said Julian Bond has specifically and publicly endorsed in full a policy statement of an organization known as the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, which statement reads as follows:

> 'We are in sympathy with, and support, the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft which would compel them to contribute their lives to United States aggression in Viet Nam in the name of the 'freedom' we find so false in this country.'
> 'We recoil with horror at the inconsistency of a supposedly free society where responsibility to freedom is equated with the responsibility to lend oneself to military aggression. We take note of the fact that 16 per cent of the draftees from this country are Negroes called on to stifle the liberation of Viet Nam, to preserve a 'democracy' which does not exist for them at home . . .'

"We, therefore, encourage those Americans who prefer to use their energy in building democratic forms within this country. We believe that work in the civil rights movement and with other human relations organizations is a valid alternative to the draft. We urge all Americans to seek this alternative, knowing full well that it may cost them their lives -- as painfully as in Viet Nam.'

"(4) That the said Julian Bond is not qualified under the Constitution of Georgia to take the oath as a Member of the House of Representatives representing the 136th Representative District of Fulton County, Georgia, inasmuch as his full endorsement of the aforesaid policy statement of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee is totally and completely repugnant to and inconsistent with the mandatory oath prescribed by the Constitution of Georgia for a Member of the House of Representatives to take before taking his seat.

"(5) That the said Julian Bond cannot justly and honestly take the aforementioned mandatory constitutional oath which requires him to uphold the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of Georgia, having endorsed the aforesaid subversive policy statement."

At the Committee hearing, the proponents of the contest sought to substantiate their claim by having played into the record a taped newscaster's interview with Mr. Bond which, although not made by him as a public statement upon his own initiative in the normal manner of making a hortatory expression, was made, it may be assumed, with the knowledge that it would be broadcast by the newscaster. The Committee also invited from Mr. Bond his comment. He stated to the Committee that he "did support" the statement of the SNCC, quoted above, in its entirety.

In support of the charge that Bond had "said that he admires the courage of those persons who burn their draft cards", the following question was asked: "Do you admire the courage of persons who burn their draft cards?" after which, the following question and answers occurred:

"A. I admire people who take an action, and I admire people who feel strongly enough about their convictions to take an action like that knowing the consequences that they will face, and that was my original statement when asked that question.

"Q. Do you still adhere to that statement?

"A. Yes, I do.

"Q. Let me see if I have your statement correct, that you admire people who are willing to take the consequences, to stand up for their principles, is that substantially what you said?

"A. That is correct.

"Q. And does that admiration of such people go to taking such a stand, when such a stand is in violation of a valid law of the United States?

"A. I have never suggested or counseled or advocated that anyone other person burn their draft card. In fact, I have mine in my pocket and will produce it if you wish. I do not advocate that people should break laws. What I simply try to say was that I admired the courage of someone who could act on his convictions knowing that he faces pretty stiff consequences.

"Q. So that you admire the courage of the persons in the given instance who burn their draft cards, or who were willing to take the consequences for burning their draft cards?

"A. That is right."

In a written response to the charges and during the proceedings Representative Bond stated his willingness and desire to take the oath to support the Constitutions of the United States and the State of Georgia as prescribed by the Georgia Constitution.

It is clear that the refusal to seat this elected representative was upon the charge, adequately proven, of his stated support in an interview with a newsman and subsequently in the corridor of the House of Representatives (after the challenge had been referred to the Committee) of the SNCC statement and his views touching on the draft card matter.

The suit before us challenges the authority of the House of Representatives, under the provision making it "the Judge of the . . . qualifications of its members" to deny an elected member, the right to be seated for any lack of qualifications not specifically prescribed in the Georgia Constitution. Further, the complaint asserts that the actual ground of his rejection as a member was the disapproval by the House of his conduct, to-wit: the expression of the extremely unpopular (characterized as illegal and disloyal by the proponents of the contest) views as above set out; that a denial of his seat because of such conduct constitutes an abridgment by the State of Georgia of Bond's freedom of speech in violation of the guarantee of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution, which guarantee is made effective as against State action by "absorption" into the guarantee of due process by the Fourteenth Amendment. See Palko v. Connecticutt, 302 U.S. 319, 324, 326.

The complaint requires the convening of a three-judge District court under Title 28, Section 2281, United States Code Annotated, because it charges that if Article III, Section VII, Paragraph 1 of the Georgia Constitution, supra (making each House the judge of the qualifications of its members), is construed in the manner in which it was applied in this case, then the said Section of the Georgia Constitution is invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment. Once convened properly, such a court has jurisdiction to decide every question involved in the litigation, state as well as federal. Missouri v. Brashear Freight Lines, 312 U.S. 621; R.R. Comm. of Calif. v. Pacific Gas & Electric Company, 302 U.S. 388.

It is a basic principle of jurisprudence that if, by construction of a statute in a manner that will make it constitutional, this avoids the question whether the statute, differently construed, would be unconstitutional, a court should first construe the statute with an eye to the avoiding of the constitutional question if possible. See Rescue Army, et al, v. Municipal Court of Los Angeles, 331 U.S. 549, 568, et seq.

Thus, we look first to determine whether the challenged provision of the Georgia Constitution may properly be construed so as to permit the unseating of Representative-Elect Bond on the grounds stated. Of course, if the Georgia Supreme Court had construed the statute in such a manner this construction of the Georgia Constitution would be binding on us. The Court has not so construed it.

The State of Georgia claims that, at least within the factual context of this contest, the power of the House of Representatives to judge Bond's qualifications is "plenary." It offers, in support of this proposition, three Georgia Court decisions: Rainey v. Taylor, 166 Ga. 476 (1928); Beatty v. Myrick, 218 Ga. 629 (1963); and Fowler v. Bostick, 99 Ga. App. 428 (1959).

In point of fact, in none of these Georgia decisions did the court determine that the House or Senate had absolute and final jurisdiction to judge whether the contesting parties lacked qualifications which are not expressly stated as "qualifications" or rules of "eligibility" in the Georgia Constitution.

The Rainey case dealt with a charge by one Taylor, in a quo warranto proceeding against Rainey, that Rainey was, at the time of his election to the Georgia General Assembly, an acting superintendent of Schools. It being provided in the Georgia Constitution that the "qualifications of members" is to be decided by the House of Representatives, and, the Constitution in what is now Section 2-1606, quoted supra, providing that the holder of another state office "shall not have a seat in either House," it was a question for the General Assembly to judge whether Rainey was disqualified under a stated ground in the constitution. The Court merely held that a rule of "eligibility" was comprehended within the term "qualifications."

In the subsequent case of Beatty v. Myrick, in a headnote opinion, the Supreme Court of Georgia stated that the question was which of two named candidates was legally elected to represent the Third Senatorial District in the State Senate. There was thus no question of testing the "qualifications" of the senator-elect. It was simply a matter of judging who was the winner of the election. This question is expressly confided by the Constitution to the State Senate.

Fowler v. Bostick was in all respects similar to the Rainey case. It was an action for a declaratory judgment seeking to disqualify Bostick as ineligible to be seated as Representative of Tift County because he was, at the time, alleged to hold the office of Clerk of the Superior Court of Tift County. Here, as in Rainey, the court was asked to determine whether an elected member met the qualifications expressly stated in the Georgia Constitution. Of course, no criticism can be made of such a decision as these three by the Georgia courts. The question, not before the Court there, is whether, under the Georgia Constitution, the Legislature can find a lack of qualifications beyond those expressly provided for in the Constitution itself and as set out above.

In the absence of a strong showing of judicial interpretation to the contrary, it would seem that simple justice would require a holding that where specific qualifications are stated for an office and the Legislature is given the power to judge whether an aspirant for the office is "qualifield", the legislature, as judge, should be required to look to the stated qualifications as the measuring stick. To hold to the contrary and permit the House as judge to go at large in a determination of whether Representative-Elect "A" meets undefined, unknown and even constitutionally questionable standards shocks not only the judicial, but also the lay sense of justice.

It can be readily understood why there are few legal precedents to give guidance in such a situation. In the first place, it can be assumed that members of a state or national legislature are prone to recognize the right of the electorate to choose as their representative whom they want to serve them. Thus, there may not be expected to be many clear precedents. Further it is readily apparent that in those cases in which a legislative body has exceeded its authority the shortness of the term of office may make moot any contest in court.

Nevertheless, there are some legislative precedents. In a New York state general election held on November 4, 1919, five members of the Socialist party were elected as members of the General Assembly of the State of New York.

They appeared and took the oath of office, and thereupon, as soon as the House was organized, a motion was made to deprive them of their rights to participate, or, in other words, to expel them from membership in the House. A resolution for such expulsion was submitted and referred to a committee which conducted hearings resulting in a resolution to expel, and the members were later, by action of the Legislature, expelled from membership.

During the pendency of the hearings, the annual meeting of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York adopted a resolution authorizing appointment of a committee "to appear before the Assembly or its Judiciary Committee and take such action as may in their judgment be necessary to safeguard and protect the principles of representative government guaranteed by the Constitution, which are involved in the proceedings now pending."

This Committee, under the Chairmanship of Honorable Charles E. Hughes, a former Governor of the state of New York and a former member of the United States Supreme Court who resigned to be a candidate for the presidency of the United States in the elections in 1916, and who later was reappointed to the Supreme Court of the United States and became Chief Justice, and including in its membership Honorable Joseph M. Proskauer, later an eminent New York Supreme Court Justice, and Honorable Ogden L. Mills, who later became Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, (the other members, Honorable Morgan J. O'Brien and Honorable Louis Marshall, all doubtless men of similar public spirit and competence, but their names do not at the moment call to mind the character of their other public service) filed a careful brief, because, as the Committee said, they regarded "these proceedings as inimical to our institutions, because they tend to subvert the very foundation upon which they rest -- representative government." In the course of the discussion of the situation then pending, the Committee made it plain that the action was an action for expulsion rather than an action to determine the qualifications of the members under the provisions of the New York Constitution similar to that of the State of Georgia. In pointing to the reason why they considered the proceedings not a testing of "the qualifications" of the members, they cited from the proceedings of the United States Senate, in which Senator Reed Smoot, of Utah, was the subject of proceedings attacking his membership in the United States Senate on the charge that he was one of the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church, and, therefore, a prominent member of the hierarchy, and, though not a polygamist, sanctioned polygamy, a practice prohibited by the organic act of Congress admitting Utah as a state.

In the course of the Smoot proceedings, Senator Philander C. Knox, a distinguished Senator from the state of Pennsylvania, discussed the question of testing the qualifications of a member of the Senate under the United States Constitutional provisions that are similar to those in Article III, Section V, etc., set out above. His statement is a complete answer to the claim that a legislature may require any qualifications it chooses. Senator Knox said:

> "I have intentionally referred to the proposed action against Senator Smoot as expulsion. I do not think the Senate will seriously consider that any question is involved except one of expulsion, requiring a two-thirds vote.[1] There is no question as to Senator Smoot possessing the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution and therefore we cannot deprive him of his seat by a majority vote. He was, at the time of his election, over 30 years of age and had been nine years a citizen of the United States, and when elected was an inhabitant of Utah. These are the only qualifications named in the Constitution, and it is not in our power to say to the States, 'these are not enough; we require other qualifications,' or to say that we cannot trust the judgment of the states in the selection of Senators, and we, therefore, insist upon the right to disapprove them for any reason. This claim of right to disapprove is not even subject to any rule of the Senate specifying additional qualifications of which the states have notice at the time of selecting their senators, but it is said to be absolute in each case as it arises, uncontrolled by any canon or theory whatever . . . . Subject to these limitations imposed by the Constitution, the states are left untrammeled in their right to choose their senators." (Underscoring supplied.)

1. Under the United States Constitution, a majority of the Senate could find a Senator not qualified, whereas it required a two-thirds vote to expel a member. This is similar to the Georgia Constitution.

The record discloses that the Senate declined to expel or otherwise deny Senator Smoot his right to sit. However, the five members of the New York State Legislature, whose cause was so eloquently presented by the Hughes Committee, did not fare so well. They were denied their seats.

Expressing their own views again on the question of the power of the Legislature to disqualify a member for grounds other than those stated in the Constitution, the Hughes Committee stated:

"We contend that the opinion expressed by Senator Knox in the case of Senator Smoot, supra, correctly defines what is meant by qualification. The constitution expressly specifies a number of disqualifications [as is also true in the Georgia Constitution] . . . The principle of constitutional interpretation applicable to this phase of the subject was elaborated in classic phrase by Chancellor Sanford in Barker v. People, 3 Cowen, 703, which, although decided in 1824, and therefore involving the interpretation of an earlier Constitution, is nevertheless as applicable in principle to the present Constitution: 'Eligibility to public trust, is claimed as a constitutional right, which cannot be abridged or impaired. The Constitution established and defines the right of suffrage; and gives to the electors and to their various authorities, the power to confer public trust . . . . Excepting particular exclusions thus established, the electors and the appointing authorities are, by the Constitution wholly free to confer public stations upon any person, according to their pleasure. The Constitution giving the right of election and the right of appointment; these rights consisting essentially in the freedom of choice; and the Constitution also declaring, that certain persons are not eligible to office; it follows from these powers and provisions, that all other persons are eligible. Eligibility to office is not declared as a right or principle, by any expressed terms of the Constitution; but it results, as a just deduction, from the expressed powers and provisions of the system. The basis of the principle, is the absolute liberty of electors and the appointing authorities, to choose and to appoint any person, who is not made ineligible by the Constitution . . . I, therefore, conceive it to be entirely clear that the Legislature cannot establish arbitrary exclusions from office or any general regulation requiring qualifications, which the Constitution has not required.' . . . He would be indeed a bold individual who would assert that any American Legislative body can set up an arbitrary standard of qualification of its members that finds no sanction in the general will of the people and that is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution . . . ." Brief of Special Committee appointed by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, January 20, 1920. (Underscoring supplied.)

A number of actions of the United States House of Representatives or the United States Senate are cited by the State as illustrative in its argument that the term "qualification," is broad enough to encompass a test of the representative elect's general character and loyalty. Based upon the excerpts from these cases as contained in the State's brief, each of them is to be distinguished.

The first of these cases is that of Victor Berger, a Congressman from Wisconsin, who had served in the House from 1911 to 1913. In 1918, he was again elected to the 66th Congress. Before appearing to be sworn in, he was indicted by the grand jury in the United States District Court for the violation of the Espionage Act. He was found guilty and sentenced to 20 years [illegible] pending at the time he offered to [illegible] the United States [illegible]. The House of Representatives adopted the report of the Committee, which found that "the question was 'whether or not Victor L. Berger was guilty of a violation of the Espionage Act, whether or not he did give aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States during the war with Germany [which, of course, in time of war, would amount to treason under the Constitution of the United States] and whether or not he was ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives." The Committee found "after a careful consideration of all the evidence, in the opinion of your committee, the admitted acts, writings, and declarations of Victor L. Berger . . . giving such acts in the language of the writings and declarations their ordinary, everyday meaning, and without considering any other evidence, clearly establishes a conscious, deliberate and continuing purpose and intent to obstruct, hinder and embarrass the government of the United States and the prosecution of the war, and thus to give aid and comfort to the enemies of our country . . . ."

The United States Constitution, in describing the crime of treason provides that "the Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason," Article III, Chapter 3, Section 3[2]. Congress has determined that one of the punishments for treason is that "Every person so convicted of treason shall, moreover, be incapable of holding any office under the United States." This was the language of the statute that was in effect at the time of Berger's contest. The present counterpart is found in 18 U.S.C.A., §2381, in which it says that a person so convicted "shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States."

Thus, although he had been convicted of sedition and not treason, Berger's rejection by the House of Representatives was on a determination by the House that he had committed treason, which if found by a court would be a lack of qualifications prescribed by the United States Constitution. Although in the committee report, it was argued that the House was not limited to constitutionally defined "qualifications" in passing upon Berger's eligibility, nevertheless the action of the House in rejecting him falls within the pattern of what is permissible under the principles discussed in the Hughes Committee Report, supra. There was no court test of this exclusion.

William Blount, of Tennessee, was expelled from the Senate after having been seated. He was expelled "for conduct inconsistent with his public duty, rendering him unworthy of further continuance of his present public trust." This action was taken under the provision of the United States Constitution which authorizes "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member." Article I, Sec. 5, Clause 2. It has nothing to do with Article I, Section 5, Clause 1, which provides that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members . . . ." This is an important distinction because the authority to expel, unlike the provision relating to qualifications, is not limited by any language in the Constitution prescribing the grounds for expulsion.

John Smith, of Ohio, was cited for treason and misdemeanor as an accomplice of Aaron Burr. The Senate voted 19 for expulsion and 10 against. On the resolution failing to secure the necessary two-thirds, Smith retained his seat. Here, again, it was an action of expulsion. It is no precedent for giving "plenary" power to judge qualification.

John M. Niles, of Connecticut, was examined before taking the oath of office as to his mental capacities. The Committee found that he suffered under a mental physical debility, but that he was able to perform his duties, and he was seated. Of course, as noted above, insanity is a qualification by the Georgia Constitution for members of the House and Senate of this State.

John D. Bright, of Indiana, was expelled because it was found that he had written a certain letter to assist a member of the Confederate states to buy firearms. Note again that this was a matter of expulsion for an act of misconduct while a member and not a matter of determining qualification to be seated.

Joshua Hill and H.V.M. Miller, of Georgia, were refused seats in the United States Senate because of the manner in which the Georgia General Assembly, which had elected Hill and Miller, was conducting its elections. (Of course, this was at a time prior to the adoption of the 16th Amendment, and senators were elected by the State Legislatures.) This, of course, went directly to the question of judging "the election," which is expressly authorized by the United States and Georgia Constitutions. The Reed Smoot case has been discussed previously. It was again, a question of expelling a senator and not one of passing on his qualifications at the time he presented himself.

The most recent case involved Senator Theodore G. Bilbo, who was not administered the oath pending an investigation of charges that his actions dealing with racial policies were said to be "contrary to the public policy, harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate, dangerous to the perpetuity of free government, and taint [sic] with fraud and corruption of the credentials."

If a substantial part of the charge was the question of fraud and corruption of the credentials, this, of course, would be a matter of judging "the election," which is specifically authorized. In any event, Senator Bilbo was forced to step aside for an operation and he died before action was taken on his seating.

In 1926, William S. Vare, of Pennsylvania, and Frank L. Smith, of Illinois, were refused seats for excessive expenditures during their respective election campaigns. Once again this was a question of judging "the election," authority for which is expressly given to the Senate.

If there are other cases involving action by the United States Congress in which it is expressly shown that it has assumed the right to expand the list of qualifications beyond those stated in the United States Constitution, they have not been brought to our attention.

It is quite difficult to ascertain from available materials, which, if any, state cases cited in the briefs of the parties were decided on a basis that explicitly shows that a state House or a state Senate has considered that it can determine a prospective member to be not qualified for grounds other than those stated in the respective constitutions as the qualifications or basis of eligibility for the office.

Representative-Elect Bond was not challenged on the ground that he was not 21 years of age; that he had not been a citizen of the State for the requisite two years and a resident of the county from which he was elected. Nor was he challenged on the ground that he had been convicted of treason against the state, embezzlement of public funds, misfeasance in office, bribery or larceny or any crime punishable by the laws of the state, punishable with imprisonment in the penitentiary. He was not charged with having received any interest, profit or perquisite arising from the use or loan of public funds. He offered to take the prescribed oath of office.

Since it cannot be claimed that he was found disqualified on some ground other than those of which he was charged, as this would be the clearest sort of deprivation of due process guaranteed not only by the United States Constitution, but also by the Georgia Constitution as well, Article I, Section I, Paragraph III, Constitution of the State of Georgia, Section 2-103, Ga. Code Ann., it is clear that Bond was found disqualified on account of conduct not enumerated in the Georgia Constitution as a basis of disqualification. This was beyond the power of the House of Representatives. It runs counter to the express provisions of the Georgia Constitution giving to the people the right to elect their representatives, and limiting the Legislature in its right to reject such elected members to those grounds which are expressly stated in Georgia's basic document.

As pointed out above, no Georgia decision has held that the courts of this state are helpless to intervene where a House of the Legislature undertakes to disqualify a person on a ground not specified. The decisions thus far reach only the proposition that where the Georgia Constitution authorizes the House to pass upon the qualifications of its members, all of the provisions in the Constitution touching on qualifications may be considered by the House in determining whether a member-elect meets the specified standards. In view of my conclusion that the action of the lower house of the General Assembly was in violation of the State Constitution, it would seem that Article I, Section IV, Paragraph II, would come into play. This section provides: "Legislative Acts in violation of this Constitution, or the Constitution of the United States, are void, and the judiciary shall so declare them." Section 2-402, Ga. Code Ann. Since, therefore, a Georgia court is given the authority to declare such an act void, as in violation of the Georgia Constitution, pendent jurisdiction places this obligation upon this Court.

While it might be argued that, under normal circumstances, if there were nothing before this Court other than the charge that the State Legislature violated the Georgia Constitution, rules of comity might require that this Court refrain from assuming jurisdiction over such a controversy, this is not such a case. If we were to refrain from acting on the State constitutional question, we would then be faced squarely with the necessity of deciding the grave Federal constitutional question. That question is, whether the plaintiff has been deprived of his First Amendment rights by the action of the Georgia House. The gravity of that question cannot be doubted, since it is clear that it was for expression of his views that Bond was denied his seat. In view of the fact that all of plaintiff's rights can be fully adjudicated by our construction of the Georgia Constitution itself, we need not, and, indeed, we should not, proceed to a consideration of the Federal constitutional issue.

I would find that the act of the Georgia House of Representatives was void as being in violation of the Georgia Constitution and would require that he be seated to the place to which he was elected.

The Supreme Court's "Modern Scientific Authorities" in the Segregation Cases

Let us consider the so-called modern authorities on psychology cited by the Court as its authority to change and destroy the constitutional guaranties of the reserved natural right of the people of the States of the Union to freedom of choice and of the States to regulate their public schools.

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 26, 1955

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, yesterday I submitted a resolution asking the Senate to endorse an investigation of the alleged scientific authorities upon which the Supreme Court relied to sustain its decision in the school integration cases of last year. As will be revealed in detail in my remarks, there is clear and unmistakable evidence that the Court chose to follow the insidious and false propaganda foisted by alien ideologies rather than rely on the Constitution as written, and long established legal precedents.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my resolution (S. Res. 104) be inserted in my remarks at this point of the RECORD.

THE RESOLUTION

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision on May 17, 1954, in the case of Brown et al. v. Board of Education of Topeka et al. and four related cases, which admittedly departed from the established law and precedents in declaring the "separate but equal" doctrine of separation of the white and black races was unconstitutional insofar as it applied to public-school facilities; and

Whereas this decision was based solely and alone on psychological, sociological, and anthropological considerations, in that the Court stated: "Whatever may have been the extent of psychological knowledge at the time of Plessy v. Ferguson, this finding is amply supported by modern authority"; and

Whereas the footnote to the opinion lists six allegedly modern authorities and concludes with the sentence: "And see generally Mydral, An American Dilemma (1944)"; and

Whereas a provisional investigation of the authorities upon which the Supreme Court relied reveals to a shocking degree their connection with and participation in the worldwide Communist conspiracy, in that Brameld and Frazier, listed in the group of 6 authorities, have no less than 28 citations in the files of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the United States House of Representatives revealing membership in, or participation with, Communist or Communist-front organizations and activities; and

Whereas the book, An American Dilemma, was prepared by a Swedish Socialist, who declared in the book that the United States Constitution was "impractical and unsuited to modern conditions" and its adoption was "nearly a plot against the common people"; and

Whereas this book was the result of collaboration between Mydral and certain alleged "scholars and experts" assigned him by the Carnegie Corp., of Alger Hiss fame; and

Whereas 16 of these so-called scholars and experts, who contributed to no less than 272 different articles and portions of the book, have been cited numerous times as members of Communist and subversive organizations; and

Whereas the citation of these authorities clearly indicates a dangerous influence and control exerted on the court by Communist-front pressure groups and other enemies of the American Republic and individual members thereof that is inimical to the general welfare and best interest of the Republic; and

Whereas this Senate, the 16 sovereign States whose constitutions were nullified by the illegal decision of the Supreme Court, and all of the people of the United States are now entitled to know beyond doubt and peradventure the complete extent and degree of Communist and Communist-front activity and influence in the preparation of the psuedo "modern scientific authority" which was the sole and only basis for the decision of the Supreme Court: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary should proceed under its presently constituted powers to investigate the extent and degree of participation by individuals and groups identified with the Communist conspiracy, Communist-front organizations, and alien ideologies, in the formation of the "modern scientific authority" upon which the Supreme Court relied in the school integration cases.

SUPREME COURT BRAINWASHED

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, somewhat more than 1 year ago I pointed out in an address on this floor that the Supreme Court had been indoctrinated and brainwashed by left-wing pressure groups; that individual members of the Court were influenced by and were guilty of grossly improper conduct in accepting awards and emoluments from groups and organizations interested in political litigation before the Court and bent on changing and destroying our American way of life; that such reprehensible conduct placed a question mark by the validity and the integrity of their decisions in cases in which these groups were interested, of which the school segregation case is one.

Today, I am calling upon the Members of the Senate to consider an even more serious problem. The Court has not only arrogated to itself powers which were not delegated to it under the Constitution of the United States and has entered the fields of the legislative and executive branches of the Government, but they are attempting to graft into the organic law of the land the teachings, preachments, and social doctrines arising from a political philosophy which is the antithesis of the principles upon which this Government was founded. The origin of the doctrines can be traced to Karl Marx, and their propagation is part and parcel of the conspiracy to divide and destroy this Government through internal controversy. The Court adopts this propaganda as "modern scientific authority."

NO PRECEDENT EXCEPT IN RUSSIA

Mr. President, in the long legal history of this country, there has never before been a time when an Appellate Court or Supreme Court of the United States relied solely and alone on scientific authority to sustain a legal decision. I am informed that in the long history of British jurisprudence, there has never been a time when the high courts of England have resorted to such dubious authority, but that their decisions have been based on the law. Mr. President, my information is that the one time when the high appellate court of any major western nation has resorted to text books and the works of agitators to sustain its decision was when the high court of Germany sustained Hitler's racist laws.

What the Bar and the people of the United States are slow to realize is that in the rendition of the opinion on the school segregation cases the entire basis of American jurisprudence was swept away. There is only one other comparable system of jurisprudence which is based upon the winds of vacillating, political, and pseudo scientific opinion—the Peoples Courts of Soviet Russia. In that vast vacuum of liberty, the basis of their jurisprudence is the vacillating, ever-changing winds of pseudo authority. And that today is the basis of American jurisprudence as announced by a unanimous opinion of our Supreme Court.

SUPREME COURT ADMITS INCOMPETENCE

Justice Frankfurter handed down an opinion as late as April 28, 1952, with the concurrence of Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Burton, Minton, and Clark, in which he absolutely denied the competence of the Court to pass upon issues such as those presented in the segregation cases. He said:

Only those lacking responsible humility will have a confident solution for problems as intractable as the frictions attributable to differences of race, color, or religion. * * * Certainly the due-process clause does not require the legislature to be in the vanguard of science—especially sciences as young as human sociology and cultural anthropology. * * *

It is not within our competence to confirm or deny claims of social scientists as to the dependence of the individual on the position of his racial or religious group in the community.

The Supreme Court, unable to relate science to the fifth amendment, has done an unheard of thing. It has now found scientific authorities to attempt to sustain its view of what the 14th amendment should mean. Who are these authorities? From what background do they come? What has been the nature of their work and activities?

THE "MODERN" AUTHORITIES

Let us consider the so-called modern authorities on psychology cited by the Court as its authority to change and destroy the constitutional guaranties of the reserved natural right of the people of the States of the Union to freedom of choice and of the States to regulate their public schools.

K. B. CLARK

First, they cited one K. B. Clark, a Negro, so-called social-science expert employed by the principal plaintiff in the segregation cases, the NAACP, whose lawyer argued these cases before the Court. To say the least, it is the most unusual procedure for any court to accept a litigant's paid employee as an authority on anything, let alone as an authority on psychology, to put him above the Constitution itself.

THEODORE BRAMELD

Then, too, we find cited by the Court as another alleged modern authority on psychology to override our Constitution, one Theodore Brameld, regarding whom the files of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the United States House of Representatives are replete with citations and information. He is cited as having been a member of no less than 10 organizations declared to be communistic, Communist-front, or Communist dominated. His name has frequently appeared in the news columns of the Daily Worker.

Brameld, according to the Communist Official Daily Worker of February 28, 1949, signed a statement of the Committee for Free Political Advocacy defending the 12 Communist leaders.

Again, on December 10, 1952, the Daily Worker shows that Brameld signed an appeal to President Truman requesting amnesty for leaders of the Communist Party convicted under the Smith Act.

And, again, on February 10, 1938, the Daily Worker shows Theodore Brameld to have signed a letter in defense of the appointment of Simon W. Gerson, a Communist, to the staff of Stanley Isaacs.

His name appears on a brief submitted by Cultural Workers to the Supreme Court in October 1949, on behalf of the 10 convicted defendants engaged in the motion-picture industry, who were charged with contempt of a congressional committee for refusing to affirm or deny membership in the Communist Party in response to committee questions.

He was affiliated with the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, as shown by the Daily Worker of August 10, 1950, which committee was cited as subversive and Communist by Attorney General Tom Clark in letters to the Loyalty Review Board, released on June 1 and September 21, 1948, and was redesignated by Attorney General Brownell, April 29, 1953, under provisions of Executive Order 10450. The Special Committee on Un-American Activities cited the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born as "one of the oldest auxiliaries of the Communist Party in the United States."

He was listed by the Daily Worker on January 11 and 25, 1938, as a supporter of the Boycott Japanese Goods Conference of the American League for Peace and Democracy. The American League for Peace and Democracy was established in the United States in 1937 as successor to the American League Against War and Fascism "in an effort to create public sentiment on behalf of a foreign policy adapted to the interests of the Soviet Union" and "was designed to conceal Communist control, in accordance with the new tactics of the Communist International."

This is shown by report of Attorney General Biddle, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 24, 1942; by report of Attorney General Clark—letters to Loyalty Review Board, released June 1 and September 21, 1948; and by Attorney General Brownell in his memorandum of April 29, 1953. The Special Committee on Un-American Activities cited the American League for Peace and Democracy as "the largest of the Communist-front movements in the United States," by its report of January 3, 1939, and other reports cited March 29, 1944.

Brameld was one of those who issued a statement of the Committee for Peaceful Alternatives to the Atlantic Pact, dated December 14, 1949, calling for an international agreement to ban the use of atomic weapons. But the Committee for Peaceful Alternatives to the Atlantic Pact was formed as a result of the Conference for Peaceful Alternatives to the Atlantic Pact to further the case of Communists in the United States doing their part in the Moscow campaign, according to a report of the Committee on Un-American Activities, April 25, 1951.

He was a sponsor of the Midcentury Conference for Peace, May 29 and 30, 1950, which was cited by the committee as having been "aimed to assembling as many gullible persons as possible under Communist direction and turning them into a vast sounding board for Communist propaganda."

Brameld was a sponsor of the Conference of the Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace, held under auspices of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, New York City, March 25–27, 1949. On April 19, 1949, the Committee on Un-American Activities cited the Cultural and Scientific Conference as a Communist-front, which "was actually a supermobilization of the inveterate wheelhorses and supporters of the Communist Party and its auxiliary organizations."

Brameld was a sponsor of a conference held October 9 and 10, 1948, by the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, which was cited as Communist-front in the same committee report on April 18, 1949.

In October 1936 he was a member of the Nonpartisan Committee for the Reelection of Congressman Vito Marcantonio, which organization was cited by the Special Committee on Un-American Activities as a Communist-front on March 29, 1944.

In 1939, Theodore Brameld also was a sponsor of the Refugee Scholarship and Peace Campaign, which was cited as Communist-front by the Special Committee on Un-American Activities in its report March 29, 1944.

There is the public record of Theodore Brameld, who was cited by the Supreme Court as a modern authority on psychology in support of its racial integration decision of May 17, 1954. This record not only was available to Chief Justice Warren and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court upon request, but this record of Brameld was made up partly by an Attorney General who is now a member of the Court which rendered that decision, and by official printed report of the administration of

Chief Justice Warren when he was governor of the State of California.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Also cited by the Court as one of its modern authorities on psychology to overthrow the accepted meaning of a provision of the United States Constitution was one E. Franklin Frazier. The files of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the United States House of Representatives contain 18 citations of Frazier's connection with Communist causes in the United States.

He signed a statement of the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, hailing the War Department's order regarding commissions for Communists. The National Federation for Constitutional Liberties was cited by the Attorney General in letters furnished the Loyalty Commission on December 4, 1947, and September 21, 1948, as subversive and Communist and, now listen, Mr. President, as "part of what Lenin called the solar system of organizations ostensibly having no connection with the Communist Party, by which Communists attempt to create sympathizers and supporters of their program." The special committee in its report of March 29, 1944, cited the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties as "one of the viciously subversive organizations of the Communist Party." On September 2, 1947, the special committee again cited the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties as among a "maze of organizations" which were "spawned for the alleged purpose of defending civil liberties in general, but actually intended to protect Communist subversion from any penalties under the law."

Frazier was a sponsor of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, which was cited as subversive and Communist by the Attorney General of the United States in letters released December 4, 1947, and September 21, 1948.

E. Franklin Frazier published a pamphlet entitled "Seeing Is Believing" in 1947, as a member of the Council on African Affairs, Inc., of which he was a member.

The Council on African Affairs, Inc., was cited as subversive and Communist by the Attorney General in letters released December 4, 1947, and September 21, 1948.

E. Franklin Frazier signed an appeal to lift the Spanish embargo sponsored by the Negro People's Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, as shown by the Daily Worker of February 8, 1939. The Negro People's Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy was cited as a Communist front organization by the Special Committe on Un-American Activities in its report of March 29, 1944.

In 1946, evidence in the House Committee on Un-American Activities showed that Frazier was a member of the Board of Directors of the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy which was cited by the Attorney General as a Communist organization in a letter released April 27, 1949.

The same Frazier, as a member of the Civil Rights Congress, signed a statement defending the Communist Party, as shown by the Communist Daily Worker, April 16, 1947. The Attorney General cited the Civil Rights Congress as subversive and Communist in letters released December 4, 1947, and September 21, 1948. The Congressional Committee, in its report of September 2, 1947, cited the group as "dedicated not to the broader issues of civil liberties, but specifically to the defense of individual Communists and the Communist Party" and "controlled by individuals who are either members of the Communist Party or openly loyal to it."

Frazier was named in the Communist Daily Worker of July 18, 1949, as one of the sponsors of a group defending the 12 Communist leaders on trial. The same information appeared on the back of a letterhead of the National Non-Partisan Committee to Defend the Rights of the 12 Communist leaders, dated September 9, 1949; and in the Daily Worker of October 3, 1949.

In 1947, Frazier was a member of the executive board of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. By the Special Committee report of March 29, 1944, the Southern Conference for Human Welfare was cited as a Communist Front Organization; and on June 12, 1947, the Congressional Committee cited the Southern Conference for Human Welfare as a Communist front organization "which seeks to attract Southern liberals on the basis of its seeming interest in the problems of the South" although its "professed interest in Southern Welfare is simply an expedient for larger aims serving the Soviet Union and its subservient Communist Party in the United States."

E. Franklin Frazier was a speaker at the Southern Negro Youth Congress, as shown by the Communist Daily Worker of January 23, 1937. The Southern Negro Youth Congress was cited as subversive and among the affilates and committees of the Communist Party, United States of America, which seeks to alter the form of Government of the United States by unconstitutional means. It was thus cited by the Attorney General in a letter released December 4, 1947. The group was cited as a Communist-front organization by the Special Committee in its report dated January 3, 1940.

Frazier's name appeared in a published signed statement in the Washington Post on May 18, 1948, as opposing the Mundt-Nixon anti-Communist bill.

E. Franklin Frazier was a member of the Citizens' Committee To Free Earl Browder, which was cited by the Attorney General as Communist, in a letter released April 27, 1949, and previously as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 24, 1942. The special committee, in its report of March 29, 1944, cited the citizens' committee as a Communist-front organization.

Frazier was a sponsor of Social Work Today, in 1940, and he was one of those credited, by its publication in February 1942, as having made it possible for Social Work Today to strengthen and prepare itself for the supreme test. Social Work Today was cited as a Communist magazine by the special committee in its report of March 29, 1944.

E. Franklin Frazier was one of those who signed a statement condemning the "punitive measures directed against the Communist Party," as shown by the Communist Daily Worker of April 16 and 20, 1947.

Frazier wrote the book The Negro in the United States, which was favorably reviewed by the Communist social journals, The Worker and Daily People's World, on May 15, 1949, and July 28, 1949; and his book was advertised in the Communist Workers Book Shop Catalogs for 1949 and 1950. Incidentally, Frazier's Communist officially adopted book The Negro in the United States is the same book which was officially adopted and cited as authority by the United States Supreme Court in its racial integration public-school cases on May 17, 1954.

The same Frazier glorified the brazen Negro Communist Paul Robeson, according to the Communist Daily Worker of November 4, 1949, by stating at a public meeting in Turner's Arena "that in American culture the Negro male has never been permitted to play a masculine role. Robeson represents the Negro man in the masculine role as a fearless and independent thinker."

Frazier was vice chairman of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, which was cited by the congressional committee, in its report of March 25, 1949, as a Communist-front organization.

E. Franklin Frazier was an endorser of the World Peace Appeal, in September

1950; he was a signer of the Stockholm World Appeal to Outlaw Atomic Weapons, in October 1950. The World Peace Appeal was cited as a petition campaign launched by the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress at its meeting in Stockholm, March 16–19, 1950, as having "received the enthusiastic approval of every section of the international Communist hierarchy"; as having been lauded in the Communist press, putting "every individual Communist on notice that he 'has the duty to rise to this appeal' "; and as having "received the official endorsement of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R., which has been echoed by the governing bodies of every Communist satellite country, and by all Communist Parties throughout the world." I refer to the congressional committee House report No. 378 on the Communist "peace" offensive, of April 1, 1951.

The same E. Franklin Frazier, according to the Communist official organs, Daily Worker, of October 19, 1950, and the Daily People's World, of October 23, 1950, was a sponsor of the American Sponsoring Committee for Representation at the World Peace Congress. In this connection, his photograph appeared in the Daily People's World. The congressional committee cited the World Peace Congress as a Communist front among the "peace conferences" which "have been organized under Communist initiative in various countries throughout the world as a part of a campaign against the North Atlantic Defense Pact."

Frazier signed a letter by the Committee for Peaceful Alternatives, on March 30, 1950.

The congressional committee, in its report on the Communist peace offensive, April 1, 1951, cited the Committee for Peaceful Alternatives to the Atlantic Pact as an organization which was formed to further the cause of Communists in the United States doing their part in the Moscow campaign.

The same E. Franklin Frazier, adopted by the United States Supreme Court as one of its leading modern authorities on psychology, was also a sponsor of the Spanish Refugee Appeal of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, which the Attorney General cited, in letters released December 4, 1947, and September 21, 1948, as subversive and Communist, and which the House special committee, in its report on March 29, 1944, cited as a Communist-front organization.

To round out his great career in the Communist cause, the same E. Franklin Frazier, according to the Communist official organ, the Daily Worker of March 5, 1951, signed a letter to President Truman, asking him to recognize the seating of the Communist Peoples Republic of China in the United Nations.

E. Franklin Frazier has been too prominently and frequently connected with Communist and subversive organizations for almost anyone in public life in Washington not to have been put on notice. Certainly, the highest Court of the land was more than careless in defending the Constitution by adopting E. Franklin Frazier as an alleged authority on modern psychology to override and overthrow the fundamental principles of our Constitution.

MYRDAL'S AMERICAN DILEMMA

The Court cited and adopted generally, and without reservation, as its leading authority on modern psychology, Myrdal's book An American Dilemma, when it said—and I quote from Chief Justice Warren's opinion: "And see generally Myrdal, An American Dilemma, 1944."

Let us take a look and see what the Court adopted as its leading authority on modern psychology as the basis for its racial integration decision, when it adopted Myrdal's An American Dilemma.

In 1937 the Carnegie Foundation brought over Dr. Gunnar Myrdal, professor in the University of Stockholm. He was described by the corporation as a social economist. He called himself a social engineer. He was a Socialist who had served the Communist cause. He admitted he had no knowledge of the Negro question in the United States. He was hired to make an investigation of race relations in this country; was given an ample staff and funds for that purpose, and was told to publish his findings. On this project Myrdal naturally found himself in the company of those recommended by the Carnegie Foundation, of Alger Hiss fame.

MYRDAL'S CONTEMPT FOR U. S. CONSTITUTION

Myrdal has an utter contempt for the principles upon which the United States was founded and for the political system to which the people adhere. It is incredible that the Supreme Court could have overlooked, if they read it at all, certain remarks that are contained in his book, on which the Court mainly bases its decision. Myrdal stated that the Constitution of the United States was "impractical and unsuited to modern conditions" and its adoption was "nearly a plot against the common people." This is purely Communist propaganda, which was cited by the Supreme Court, and on which the Chief Justice of the United States based a very far-reaching decision looking to the destruction of our form of government. I have often wondered what was the source of the pro-Communist influence in the Supreme Court.

Myrdal shows that he did not write this 1,400 page book himself. He hedged himself about with many self-imposed restrictions and "value premises," so that the book has no scientific validity, either from the standpoint of biology, sociology, or psychology.

THE COOPERATIVE SOCIAL EXPERTS

Myrdal shows that his book was the work of several so-called social experts furnished him by the Carnegie Foundation, of Alger Hiss fame. It would be more in keeping with the facts, if, when Myrdal gave the names of most of these Carnegie Foundation "social experts," he had said that they were taken right out of lists of members of Communist and subversive organizations dedicated to the overthrow of our Constitution and the United States Government, because that is the actual fact.

If Chief Justice Warren had only taken the time and trouble to refresh his memory from his own State's officially printed reports and records of his own administration as governor of his own State, he would have found, and he can still find, the names of these Myrdal "social experts" in the fourth report on un-American activities in California, 1948, and the sixth report published in 1951 on Communist front organizations by the Joint Fact-Finding Committee to the 1948 and 1951 regular California Legislature, when the Chief Justice was governor of the State of California.

Certainly Judge Warren cannot claim unfamiliarity with his own State official reports on such an important subject.

I shall give 16 names furnished by the Carnegie Foundation as "social experts" to Gunnar Myrdal, the Swedish "social engineer," for the writing of "An American Dilemma" adopted in full by the Court and their Communist connections according to the official 1948 California report, made at the time the Chief Justice was Governor of California.

The tenor of that book is to the effect that the American form of government has outlived its usefulness, and that the Constitution of the United States is a plot against the common people of this country. That was the message of the principal authority relied on by the Chief Justice of the United States in this far-reaching decision.

NAMES AND ORGANIZATIONS

The names and organizations with which the Myrdal advisers were affiliated are as follows:

Frank Boas was 1 of 17 liberal leaders who signed a letter addressed to American Civil Liberties Union, supporting the Soviet Union; chairman of the American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom, successor to the Communist front, the Scientists' Committee; affiliated with the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born; member of the American Committee To Save Refugees; affiliated with American League for Peace and Democracy; member of the National Council of the American Peace Mobilization; affiliated with the Citizens Committee To Free Earl Browder; affiliated with Committee To Defend America by Keeping Out of the War; member of the Provisional Committee of the Conference on Constitutional Liberties in America; on advisory board of Films for Democracy; member of John Reed Clubs; member of National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights; associated with National Federation for Constitution Liberties; affiliated with People's Peace; supported the Stalin-Hitler Line Committee To Defend America by Keeping Out of War; member of Russian War Relief, Inc.; signer of the statement defending the Communist Party; and listed as a well-known Communist and sponsor of Young People's Records.

All these Frank Boas organizations were shown to be Communist or Communist-front organizations in the official 1948 California report.

W. E. B. DuBois was a member of the National Committee of All-America Anti-Imperialist League; member of the American Committee for Indonesian Independence; affiliated with American League for Peace and Democracy; sponsor of China Conference Arrangements Committee; affiliated with Citizens Committee To Free Earl Browder; consultant to Committee for a Democratic Eastern Policy; contributed to the Communist official organ, the Daily Worker; and a signer of the Golden Book of American Friendship With the Soviet Union.

These organizations are listed as Communist or fronts:

Alain Locke was affiliated with American League for Peace and Democracy; sponsor of China Conference Arrangements Committee; sponsor of Conference on Constitutional Liberties in America; signer of Golden Book of American Friendship With the Soviet Union; among the instructors and guest lecturers of Jefferson School of Social Science; associated with National Federation for Constitutional Liberties; signer of Statement Defending the Communist Party; and member of Board of Sponsors of People's Songs, Inc.

All these are listed as Communist fronts and Communist organizations.

Ira dea Reid was affiliated with American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born; affiliated with Citizens Committee To Free Earl Browder; member of national board of National Share-Croppers Funds; and affiliated with National Citizens' Political Action Committee; American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born; American League Against War and Fascism; Citizens Committee To Free Earl Browder; National Federation for Constitutional Liberties; and Southern Conference for Human Welfare.

All these organizations are listed as Communist or Communist fronts.

Doxey Wilkerson was consultant to the Committee for a Democratic Eastern Policy, which is listed as a Communist-front organization.

Ruth Benedict, according to the Daily Worker of March 31, 1947, page 11, was the coauthor of a pamphlet The Races of Mankind, which the War Department banned.

Charles S. Johnson was national vice chairman of National Share-Croppers Fund; affiliated with American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born; National Federation for Constitutional Liberties; and Southern Conference for Human Welfare.

These organizations were listed as Communist fronts.

Clark Foreman was one of the initiators of a National Congress on Civil Rights, out of which emerged the Civil Rights Congress; speaker at conference and vice chairman of National Committee To Win the Peace; and vice chairman of Progressive Citizens of America.

These organizations are listed as Communist fronts.

Arthur Raper was a member of national board of National Sharecroppers Fund; affiliated with Council of Young Southerners; League of Young Southerners; and Southern Conference for Human Welfare.

These organizations were listed as Communist fronts.

Lewis Webster Jones was national sponsor of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, successor to the discredited Communist front, the Friends of the Soviet Union.

Rose Nelson was listed as Communist or Communist fellow-traveler, and textbook writer for use in public schools.

Sterling Brown was affiliated with League of American Writers, which is a Communist-front organization.

Eveline Burns was listed as Communist, textbook writer, and member of Citizens' Committee for Better Education, a Communist front.

Thomas Jones was advocate of United Negro and Allied Veterans of America, cited as a Communist-front organization.

T. Arnold Hill was cooperator-sponsor of Social Work Today which is a Communist periodical.

One of the so-called social scientists who also contributed to the writing Myrdal's An American Dilemma adopted by the Supreme Court as its authority on modern psychology, was none other than E. Franklin Frazier, whose 18 Communist organizations connections I have already given.

An American Dilemma was written in largest part by American Communist front members, such as E. Franklin Frazier, who contributed to 28 portions of the book, and W. E. B. DuBois, who contributed to 82 different portions of the book. Altogether the Communist front members identified with Myrdal's An American Dilemma contributed to 272 different articles and portions of the book officially adopted by the Communist Party and by the Supreme Court as its authority for its racial integration decision of May 17, 1954.

That is the true picture presented by an analysis from the records of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the school segregation cases.

How can the Court expect the American people to accept its decision to change the accepted meaning of the fundamental principles of our Constitution when its decision is contrary to every other decision of the United States Supreme Court on the same question, and when its decision is now based on its adoption of members of Communist organizations and Communist writings as its authority to change fundamental principles of the Constitution?

This same Gunnar Myrdal has recently appeared in the news as directing the staff of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe in the preparation of a report regarding the foreign operation of the American Oil Industry. Myrdal's Commission feels that American oil companies "overcharged" their European customers for Middle Eastern oil, and hinted that some sort of international price control is the indicated remedy.

SATURDAY EVENING POST COMMENT ON MYRDAL

The Saturday Evening Post comments editorially that Myrdal is a Swedish Socialist. I quote:

The author of a report on the race problem in the United States. In the course of this "monumental work" Myrdal described the adoption of the United States Constitution as "nearly a plot against the common people." It asks, Is Myrdal the best authority a U. N. agency could rely on for a complicated study of the oil industry?

It is a tragic commentary on the intelligence and judgment of the members of the United States Supreme Court that they would override the Constitution on the alleged evidence and opinion of such a "psychological" authority. It is the final indication as to the degree and extent that the Court has been "brainwashed" by pressure groups and is willing to sacrifice the people, the Constitution, and established law to communistic and socialistic dogma and principles.

Mr. President, it is evident that the decision of the Supreme Court in the school segregation cases was based upon the writings and teachings of pro-Communist agitators and other enemies of the American form of government. The Chief Justice of the United States actually cites as authority for his decision a book, the thesis of which is that the Constitution of the United States is "impractical and unsuited to modern conditions" and its adoption was "nearly a plot against the common people." Our country has come to a sorry state of affairs when the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, speaking for all the members of the Court, should cite, as his authority for a decision, a book compiled by an alien who advocates the destruction of the American form of government—the very form of government which this Chief Justice and this Court are sworn to uphold.

SOUTH WILL NOT OBEY DECISION

Mr. President, the question is asked, Will the South obey this decision of the Supreme Court? Who is obligated morally or legally to obey a decision whose authorities rest not upon the law but upon the writings and teachings of pro-Communist agitators and people who have a long record of affiliations with anti-American causes and with agitators who are part and parcel of the Communist conspiracy to destroy our country? From the beginning of the Republic, the judiciary, the Congress, the executive branch of the Government, and all the States have recognized that a State has the power under the Constitution to segregate children in its schools because of race. The Supreme Court of the United States has consistently so held throughout the years. Any person is credulous indeed to believe that southern people will permit all this to be swept aside by a Court who relies for its authority not upon the law but upon pro-Communist agitators and enemies of our system of government.

Mr. President, for the welfare of America, the resolution to investigate this setup should be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to join the Senator from Mississippi in sponsoring the resolution.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] be added as a cosponsor of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I make the request in view of the fact that the Subcommittee on Internal Security has been making a study of the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TUESDAY	Friday starting at 10:00 a. m.
WEDNESDAY	Monday starting at 8:00 a. m.
THURSDAY	Monday starting at 2:30 p. m.
FRIDAY	Tuesday starting at 2:30 p. m.
SATURDAY	Wednesday starting at 12:00 noon.
SUNDAY	Thursday starting at 8:00 a. m.

LUCE PRESS CLIPPING

why LUCE PRESS CLIPPING is the fastest

1

LUCE has only ONE Reading Office . . . right in the geographical center of the country! This office, in Topeka, Kansas, receives and processes all dailies, weeklies, and magazines from all parts of the United States.

2

Clips are mailed to clients on a regular every-other-day schedule (or daily with no extra charge if desired). They are sent by First Class Mail . . . or where necessary to insure next-day delivery they are sent by Air Mail (at no extra cost).

3

The LUCE client never is the victim of long delays while his papers go all the way across the country. Instead, all these factors add up to bring him his clips several days faster than is possible under any other arrangement.

and why LUCE PRESS CLIPPING provides the best service

LITERALLY TWO SERVICES

LUCE is really more than just a clipping service. It is two clipping services. One separate staff, specially trained and briefed, reads NEWSPAPERS . . . another reads MAGAZINES. This means maximum efficiency of coverage of these two equally important but entirely different types of publications. Yet you pay no more—our charges are the same that you might pay for a bureau reading just newspapers or just magazines.

PROOF OF COVERAGE

LUCE doesn't just claim to read all the Newspapers and Magazines in the United States. This Directory offers you the proof! And if you know of any publication not listed we will subscribe for it and begin reading it as noted in the LUCE WARRANTY on the back cover of this Directory. LUCE clients know they never miss a clipping because their bureau didn't read the publication in which it appeared!

UNIQUE METHODS

LUCE uses many unique methods to always insure clients a superior clipping service. Among these are:

CHECKING—a minimum of 10% of the work of every reader is regularly checked to guarantee that she is maintaining maximum efficiency levels.

DAILY BULLETIN—details new orders of the day, so that there is no delay in getting the readers to work on new accounts or changes in order instructions.

LECTURES—four different types of lectures are given readers every day to help them operate at maximum efficiency.

IBM—we use the latest in IBM equipment to pin-point orders for local attention, plant city locations, special meetings or events, etc. When a reader is out sick or on vacation the client doesn't suffer.

SERVICE OFFICES

All of LUCE'S reading is done in the center of the country, where it can provide the best possible results. At the same time, LUCE maintains fully staffed Sales and Service offices in New York City, Chicago, and Los Angeles. The Office Executive in each of these offices has had many years experience with our organization. He is thoroughly familiar with every account and client in his area. Instructions given any of these offices are relayed in less than a minute by direct teletype wire to the central reading office.

how to order

what to tell us

Tell us specifically what you want us to look for, and we'll do just that: mentions of the company, its subsidiaries, plant locations, product names, special key words, and what the company or organization makes or does. Ads also, if desired. Anything applicable to an order may be included with no additional monthly reading charge, including publicity and ads of the competition. Rule to remember: YOU CAN'T TELL US TOO MUCH!

what to send us

If you are sending publicity to newspapers or magazines, please send us three copies of each release at the same time it is sent the publications. These should be sent to the central production office: LUCE Building, Topeka, Kansas. If possible, include distribution lists to help us get maximum results for you on each release. Also, advise us of itineraries, meeting and convention dates, etc..

what you get

Unless otherwise directed, your order includes reading of all newspapers and magazines. When a story is syndicated, or goes out over a wire service, each publication printing the story is clipped and charged as a clipping unless otherwise specified. Ads are never included unless requested.

what about changes?

If you wish to change any of the instructions on your order, or delete or add new listings, you may do so at any time. When material is eliminated it takes 3 days to clear items previously marked through our manufacturing processes.

LUCE PRESS CLIPPING

EXTRA SERVICES to meet your every need

With LUCE, each client is a special, personalized assignment. For that reason, we give each one exactly the press coverage wanted, and a variety of helpful auxiliary services as well. These include:

LUCE CLIPPING NEWSLETTER—published bi-monthly, it gives information of interest to the Public Relations and Advertising fraternity. Also each issue includes information on any changes in the status of Daily Newspapers. Anyone's name will be added to the mailing list without charge upon request.

CANADIAN PRESS COVERAGE will be furnished if desired (both French and English language papers) as part of your domestic clipping order at no extra reading charge.

PUBLICITY CAPSULES—monthly summary reports on clipping coverage. Listed by releases or type of news, the name of the source paper or magazine, its frequency of publication, date of publication, and circulation, is given for each clipping.

SCRAP BOOKS. LUCE scrap books come in black, green and maroon simulated leather, in both 12″ x 15″ and 18″ x 24″ sizes. These are attractive and permanent, perfect for record or presentation use.

PASTE-UP SERVICE. This exclusive LUCE service saves the cost of clerical help, and enables us to deliver an attractive, professional-looking finished scrapbook. We supply all labor, and paste-up according to your layout, at a very modest cost per page.

Getting the Right Clippings
Means Giving Adequate Instructions

A Simple Five-Point Plan To Improve Your Clipping Service

By JOHN P. FRENCH

NO MATTER who you are—no matter who your company or client is — when you place a clipping order with any clipping bureau, you are, in all probability, going to get less than 100 per cent of the items you want which run in the papers and magazines read by that bureau. This is because of the human element involved in reading thousands of subjects.

Nevertheless, anyone can take certain positive action which will insure against any but a modest percentage of clippings being missed.

1. Instructions: They should be complete. Specifically, these are the things your clipping bureau should be told:

- The Where: Details on the location of the company, or home town of the individual. Include location of subsidiaries, sales offices, etc.
- The What or Who: Information on what the firm or individual does. What makes it newsworthy? What is being published?
- The Keys: A list of trade names and generic terms to be used in news or feature stories. This is to give readers every possible way to watch for the order—and extra chances to find clippings however a paper or magazine may choose to print the story.

One further suggestion. It is the policy of most clipping bureaus to include as many subjects on an order as the client wishes, without any additional charge, provided all have bearing on that order. Consequently, subsidiary companies, product names, personnel and any generic terms which may be used should be given when an order is placed. As new ones are added, the bureau should be advised of them.

2. Restrictions. These should be applied carefully.

When restrictions must be made, the instruction should be TANGIBLE and stated in the NEGATIVE. This leaves the least possible chance of readers missing desired clippings because of a misunderstanding.

For instance, never tell a bureau to "mark only financial news." What might seem financial news to one reader may in the mind of the one sitting next to her not be financial news at all . . . and what might seem financial news in her judgment may not be in the client's opinion. The same is true about omitting something like "unfavorable news." If isn't tangible, it leaves too much to judgment.

On the other hand if sport news isn't wanted, a reader can clearly understand this. The same applies to something like social news of employees.

3. Releases. Copies should be sent in. A clipping bureau can't do a good job without them.

A bureau must be kept abreast of publicity activities. Put the bureau on your mailing list to receive every release sent out. When received, these releases are checked and key words underlined—then passed among the readers so that they receive an extra reminder.

This is the minimum. But there is a further step that can be taken. Send a distribution list with each publicity release which had limited distribution (as opposed to national). It need be only a general list. If the story was sent only to certain states, these states should be listed — also, to certain categories of magazines. It is NOT necessary to list the names of the individual papers of magazines when there is a large number —just the states, cities or categories into which they fall.

4. Special Alerts. These can be extremely effective.

Advise the clipping service when a special placement in a column, a press dispatch or syndicated feature is forthcoming.

5. Complaints: Use them intelligently.

Return any clippings contrary to what was requested. These are analyzed at once. If any change in an order is required, it can be made quickly. If, on the other hand, it was a case of carelessness by the mailer, it can be taken up with the person at fault and, of course, the client's account credited.

Sometimes people hire a bureau, let it work for three months or more and then write to stop the order because the service "has been terrible from the beginning." Nobody gains this way.

These rules, if followed regularly, will bring you the clippings you and your client want.

JOHN P. FRENCH, Partner, Luce Press Clipping Bureau of Topeka, Kansas, is a journalism graduate of Washington & Lee University and a member of Signa Delta Chi.

All of LUCE'S reading, clipping, and mailing is carried on in the one central production office. Over 200 employees process thousands of clippings a day for clients in all parts of the world in this modern, air-conditioned, three-story building in downtown Topeka. How? The following will give you an idea of how we turn more than a ton of newsprint each day into quality clippings for our clients.

How They Organize in Jackson

(When a boycott for justice sweeps Jackson, Miss., the headquarters of the White Citizens Council, it is national news. This "how-we-are-doing-it" article is written by one of the participants.)

By JOHN R. SALTER, JR.

JACKSON, Miss.—For the first time in its history, this city is experiencing a far-flung Negro action economic boycott which—despite arrests, threats, and other harassment—is showing considerable signs of ultimate success.

The boycott is aimed at ending discrimination against Negro workers and consumers in this unhappy citadel of the White Citizens Council, where nearly all of the business is owned by white people who adhere rigidly to the official mores of Mississippism.

Every business in the economic nerve center of Jackson—downtown Capitol Street—is under boycott, plus selected other businesses in outlying areas. In all, 127 business establishments have experienced a dramatic fall-off in Negro trade.

There are 70,000 Negro residents in the Jackson area, which has a total population of about 150,000. The boycott is currently estimated at being at least 60 to 65 per cent successful. It will continue—week after week and month after month—until its equalitarian demands have been met.

On December 12, my wife and myself and four students—all of us NAACP members and all from Tougaloo College — officially launched the boycott by picketing in front of the Woolworth store in the center of the downtown the many Negro churches in the area.

When we got out of jail, our home—which is on the college campus — became converted to boycott headquarters, and my wife and other ladies began cooking a seemingly endless supply of food and coffee for the boycott workers who came and went.

About this time, the SNCC Freedom Singers arrived on campus—and from that time onward, everyone has been singing as they work.

Christmas drew near. All over Jackson, students from Tougaloo and other schools, as well as adults, worked on the boycott. On December 21, two more NAACP student members from Tougaloo picketed in front of Woolworth and were immediately arrested on the "obstructing" charge, jailed, and released on

Highlights of the Month

James Meredith enrolled at Ole Miss for the second semester, reversing earlier indications that he might not because of continuing persecution. But another Negro attempting to enter, Dewey Green, was refused. The Federal Government dropped charges against Gen. Edwin A. Walker, accused of helping incite Ole Miss riots last fall, after a Federal grand jury in Mississippi refused to indict him. The new governor of Alabama, George C. Wallace, shouted defiance to desegregation orders as he took office.

In contrast, however, Negroes entered peacefully for the first time at Tulane University in New Orleans and Clemson College in South Carolina (see page 3). And the governor of North Carolina, Terry Sanford, called on his state to insure equal employment to Negroes.

The U.S. Justice Department filed suits to desegregate public schools in six Deep South districts near defense installations. Included were Huntsville and Madison County, Ala., Mobile, Ala., Biloxi and Gulfport City, Miss., and Bossier Parish, La.

In Washington, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the last of Virginia's massive resistance laws. This one has restricted the role of the NAACP in integration cases, by holding the promotion of desegregation suits constituted "improper solicitation of legal business." The Court said the statute violated the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Victory By Protest

The civil rights movement won two major victories in Mississippi during the past month. Each is important not only for itself but as an illustration of the power of organized protest against injustice.

One was the case of Clyde Kennard, young Negro who was sentenced to seven years in prison on a charge of chicken-feed theft after he tried to enroll at Mississippi Southern University. (See January Patriot.)

Kennard, who is critically ill with cancer, had been in prison over two years. In just about two months after publicity and protest over

On December 12, my wife and myself and four students—all of us NAACP members and all from Tougaloo College — officially launched the boycott by picketing in front of the Woolworth store in the center of the downtown area.

We were immediately arrested by 50 or so policemen on a charge of "obstructing the sidewalk" — an offense punishable by six months in jail and a $500 fine. After two days we were released on $500 bonds.

Our arrests produced an immediate reaction. Mayor Allen Thompson of Jackson, quite sensitive indeed to the wishes of the Citizens Councils, went several times on radio and TV, and before meetings of city officials and businessmen, to threaten to line Capitol Street with "1,000 policemen" to prevent picketing. The pickets, said he, were "outside agitators who are trying to destroy our city."

While the mayor was ranting, the students at Tougaloo College mobilized and held a series of action-oriented mass meetings in which leaflet distributing teams were lined up, a chain telephone call system was set up, and delegations were organized to visit everyone has been singing as they work.

Victory By Protest

The civil rights movement won two major victories in Mississippi during the past month. Each is important not only for itself but as an illustration of the power of organized protest against injustice.

One was the case of Clyde Kennard, young Negro who was sentenced to seven years in prison on a charge of chicken-feed theft after he tried to enroll at Mississippi Southern University. (See January Patriot.)

Kennard, who is critically ill with cancer, had been in prison over two years. In just about two months after publicity and protest over the case became nationwide, Gov. Ross Barnett suspended his sentence and freed him. (Immediately after his release, Kennard entered a Chicago hospital for treatment.)

The second case was that of Ivanhoe Donaldson and Ben Taylor, Michigan students who were arrested on narcotics charges when they took food and medicine to Negroes being harassed for trying to vote in the Mississippi Delta. Police claimed there were narcotics in the medicine. (Background also in January Patriot.)

Donaldson and Taylor faced the possibility of long prison terms. After protests flowed into both Mississippi and Washington from across the country, a grand jury in Clarksdale, Miss., refused to indict them.

Aaron Henry, Mississippi president of the NAACP, called it a "tremendous victory for all the people of this nation who raised their voices in protest against this injustice."

(People answered the arrests with more food shipments as well as protests, and ironically the jailing of Donaldson and Taylor helped turn what had started with a few students into a nationwide relief drive for Mississippi.)

What really happened? Pangs of conscience among segregationist officials? Embarrassment at being made to look like ogres before the world—or a desire to keep the Federal Government off their necks?

There is no real way to know, but the important thing is that the decent people of this country can make their voices heard, even in the Deep South. When they write a letter, send a telegram, or pick up a telephone, it does make a difference. If more people realized this, justice would win more often.

U.S. Lawyers Show How Not To Win

(By Staff Correspondent)

AMERICUS, Ga. — While the civil-rights movement was winning the victories recounted at left, the U.S. Justice Department was providing a good illustration of how not to defeat Southern racists in a Federal court case here.

The case was that of Denver Edgar Short, deputy town marshal of Sasser, Ga., in nearby Terrell County, charged by the Justice Department with running three student voter-registration workers out of town at gunpoint.

This Southwest Georgia area is where interracial teams from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) have been braving violence and terror to register voters. (See December Patriot.) The incident with Deputy Short occurred at the end of last summer. The Justice Department filed charges in January—after widespread criticism that it was doing nothing to protect the registration campaign.

The case was crucial. Charles Sherrod, director of the SNCC

Deep South Action Spurs the Southwest

By BOB ZELLNER
(Special Correspondent)

The heroism, dedication and pure bravery exhibited by students and other militant freedom fighters in the Deep South has inspired students in the Southwest to organize and start action of their own to eliminate discrimination.

During a recent field trip through the Southwest I had a unique opportunity to gauge this effect. On a 2,000-mile trip, I visited some 15 colleges and spoke to about 330 students.

(The author of this article is on the staff of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). For more recent news of him, see page 4.)

I also spoke at two student conferences: the state conference of the Arkansas Methodist Student Movement (MSM) and the organizational conference of the new Southwest Student Action Coordinating Committee (SSACC).

One of the purposes of this tour was to promote the SSACC conference held in Dallas, Tex. I also sought to inform students of the work of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and to interest them in doing effective work in their own areas.

When I arrived at the University of Arkansas, I went to the Wesley Foundation House. As I entered the living room, I saw a young Negro and a young white man sitting deep in conversation.

Soon I became aware that the two earnest conversationalists were discussing world peace. Reconditioned Southerner that I am, I was thrilled to see these young Americans, both from the South, discussing peace as plain, everyday human beings.

The assistant director of the Wesley House arranged a meeting for me with several students. We discussed possible projects for the University students, and I asked them what some of their problems were.

I learned that even though the school has been desegregated for several years, sports are still for white students only, some social events are segregated and campus housing is totally segregated. The Wesley House is the only place where Negro and white students can live together.

As I am writing this several weeks later, I learn that students at the University of Arkansas are demonstrating for the removal of segregated housing. This, I think, is largely the result of the inspiration they have received from students in the Deep South who have stood up to be counted.

The Arkansas students are also negotiating for integration of theaters in Fayetteville, where the University is located. In past weeks, they have conducted sit-in

Book Notes

New Light on Monroe, N.C.

Two important publications on Monroe, N.C., have recently been issued. One is a 128-page paperback book, Negroes With Guns by Robert Williams, controversial leader now in Cuba (Marzani & Munsell, 100 W. 23rd St., New York City, $1.95).

The book is edited by journalist Marc Schleifer from a taped interview with Williams. It carries a prologue by Truman Nelson, novelist and scholar of the Abolitionist period, and reprints of two brief articles on nonviolent direct action by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The other publication is a 37-page pamphlet, People With Strength, by Truman Nelson (Committee to Aid the Monroe Defendants, 168 W. 23rd St., New York City, 35¢).

Everybody who cares about human freedom should read these publications—first, because they give a full account of what actually happened in Monroe: background of the struggle there and the tragic events that culminated in a riot and kidnap charges against Williams and four others.

Although many will debate the interpretations and conclusions, the facts—which have been reported fully in only a few places—are here.

Additionally, the book and pamphlet should be read for the light they throw on the debate over violence vs. nonviolence in the Southern struggle.

There is much misunderstanding as to what this debate is about. In my opinion, it is not—although some opponents of nonviolence paint it that way—an argument over whether a man has a right to defend his home and family against attack.

Some individuals take the position that they would not take up arms in such a situation, but so far as I know no one in the organized nonviolent movement is trying to force this decision on anyone else. What the nonviolent movement says is that the weapons of the organized social struggle should be nonviolent.

On the other hand, neither is the argument—despite the misconceptions of some believers in nonviolence—a question of aggressive violence by Negroes to attack white people. Williams has never advocated this.

What he believes is that an armed Negro community becomes a deterrent to violent white attacks and thus may lessen violence ultimately. Thus, the mounting of organized armed force becomes a weapon in the struggle—a concept similar to a deterrence policy in international affairs, and of course incompatifail to comprehend Williams' position, there seems to me in these publications a total lack of comprehension of what nonviolence means in the current Southern struggle. This is especially true in Truman Nelson's writing.

In the first place, Nelson repeatedly uses the term "nonresistance," a phrase never used among non-violent actionists of the South. Their phrase is always nonviolent direct action (NVDA).

Regardless of what Nelson thinks, Southerners involved in the nonviolent movement see it as the very opposite of submission and as the essence of resistance — people organized through their very numbers and determination to challenge oppression.

He says over and over that the nonviolent movement is draining the militancy out of Southern Negroes. And yet the facts of recent history are that it is the nonviolent idea that has inspired militancy, action and hope in community after community.

Many of the beauties Nelson found in Monroe — the dignity that comes with strength and knowing you don't have to submit anymore — are also found in Albany, Nashville, Birmingham, and all across the South where people have chosen the weapon of nonviolence.

He describes a wounded 15-year-old boy leaning against a jail wall who could yet speak with dignified defiance to a bullying policeman, and implies that this is because he was produced by a community that believed in

Ministers Ask Freedom Order

(By Staff Correspondent)

CHARLESTON, W.Va. — The Charleston Ministerial Association has called on President Kennedy to issue a Second Emancipation Proclamation, and thus "lead this nation in a dramatic leap toward full realization of democracy."

This is believed to be the first ministerial association in a Southern or Border state to take this action. The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and other civil rights groups have asked the President for such a proclamation.

In a letter to the President, the ministers noted that 100 years after the First Emancipation Proclamation ended slavery Negroes are still denied full rights as citizens. They said that a new Proclamation from the White House "would have a tremendous effect upon the climate of opinion" and "would provide the impetus that is needed to set us on the road to more accelerated change."

The letter was drafted at the request of the ministers by Dr. James L. Hupp, West Virginia state historian and archivist. Dr. Hupp is a member of the board and secretary emeritus of SCEF, and has long worked for an end to segregation.

The action of the integrated Ministerial Association came immediately after an address that Dr. Hupp made at its regular meeting. He outlined the history of the original proclamation, put into effect on January 1, 1863, by President Lincoln. Hupp urged the ministers to take the lead in calling on Kennedy for the second one.

They voted immediately to do so and asked Dr. Hupp to draft it. The letter was sent to the President two weeks later, with copies to all West Virginia congressmen and senators.

An interesting sidelight on the ministers' action was that the motion to send the communication to the President was made by the Rev. Dunbar Ogden, courageous minister who was forced to leave Little Rock, Ark., because of his stand for integration during the school crisis.

It's an indication that ministers forced from their pulpits for standing on conscience can find ways to continue witnessing to their beliefs.

Mr. Ogden is now associate pastor of Bream Memorial Presbyterian Church here, and it was in this church that the Ministerial Association met when Dr. Hupp spoke.

Pastor of the church is the Rev. Robert B. McNeill, who was also forced to leave a Georgia pulpit a few years ago because of his Christian position on race. Both Mr. McNeill and Mr. Ogden have spoken out and given leadership for human rights on many occasions since they have been in West Virginia.

In 1960, both were on a committee which drafted a resolution supporting student sit-ins which was endorsed by the Kanawha Presbytery, representing 61 Presbyterian churches in this area. (See June, 1960, Patriot.) The church where the two ministers now serve is integrated.

attack white people. Williams has never advocated this.

What he believes is that an armed Negro community becomes a deterrent to violent white attacks and thus may lessen violence ultimately. Thus, the mounting of organized armed force becomes a weapon in the struggle—a concept similar to a deterrence policy in international affairs, and of course incompatible with nonviolence.

The two publications under discussion clarify the views of Williams and his followers and the circumstances which led them to this position. Those who hope nonviolence will prevail should read them, because they articulate what many people feel and many more will express unless change comes rapidly.

One inescapable fact emerges: that Williams came to his final conclusion that organization for armed self-defense was the only solution for Southern Negroes as a result of the utter failure of the supposed forces of law (local, state or federal) to lift a finger to protect Negroes who were victims of vicious violence by white men.

In some places Federal officials at least make an effort; in Monroe they did not. And the suspicion is inevitable that Washington turned a deaf ear to Monroe precisely because many liberals had written Williams off as beyond the pale after his statements that "we must meet violence with violence."

Those who so wrote him off forgot what the real enemy was. They were fighting Williams instead of the violent racism that produced him.

Supporters of nonviolence should face the challenge this book and pamphlet raise, and make sure that nonviolence has not appealed to them just because it sounds nice and peaceful. True nonviolent direct action is revolutionary, and these writings are a reminder that it had better be if it is to solve basic problems.

On the other hand, this misunderstanding works both ways. If many endorsers of nonviolence

Albany, Nashville, Birmingham, and all across the South where people have chosen the weapon of nonviolence.

He describes a wounded 15-year-old boy leaning against a jail wall who could yet speak with dignified defiance to a bullying policeman, and implies that this is because he was produced by a community that believed in violent self-defense.

But the same description could be made of the student non-violent leader who stood up to the Georgia sheriff who slapped him and refused to stop singing freedom songs. The dignity and strength come from struggle and action, not from violence.

Nelson also needs to remember that the enemy is racism; sometimes he seems to feel it is Martin Luther King. I object when people seem to oppose Robert Williams not so much out of belief in nonviolence as because he is "unrespectable" and militant. I also object when Nelson implies that all believers in nonviolence are racist if white, and tools of racism if Negro.

This question should be argued out on the issue and not by attacks on each other by people who are supposedly fighting the same enemy.

A Letter from Clemson

By JERRY W. GAINEY

(Mr. Gainey is a Clemson student. This report was written the day after Harvey B. Gantt entered the college.)

In general, the Clemson College campus on January 28 was a scene of calmness and near-normal activity as South Carolina joined other Deep South states in lowering its barriers of segregation in education.

Although there was some vocal resistance by a few political office-holders, Harvey B. Gantt of Charleston, S. C., became the first Negro student at Clemson or in any white public school in the state.

Having learned a lesson from the careless and irresponsible position of Mississippi leaders, South Carolina business, religious, and political leaders urged that law and order reign in people's actions whether they liked the situation or not.

College officials, who also profited from the episode in Mississippi, warned students that violence or demonstrations of any kind would not be tolerated—that they were there to get an education alone. Student government leaders and other students who commented agreed.

To carry out Gantt's enrollment peacefully, the college set up precautionary measures. For example, outsiders—who reports indicate were a major factor in the calamity at Oxford—were kept off campus.

Harvey Gantt's arrival, registration, etc., proceeded smoothly. Law officers did not escort Harvey, but they were close by; as was expected, newsmen crowded around him to get his comments and picture.

Student onlookers, for the most part, were greeting Harvey with blank stares and the scanning eyes of the usual curiosity-seekers. However, there were some catcalls and sly remarks uttered throughout his first day on the campus.

The crowd followed him all afternoon. Law officers were posted in the cafeteria as he ate; they will probably be there for several days.

The blank and curious faces are still present, but several students are speaking and talking freely with him. There has been no physical restraint on these friendly students by the administration, but such is still possible.

The student attitude, typical of the Old South, does not offer much to the optimist, but there is hope in the actions already expressed by several students. What they do will quiet the fears of those who want to express themselves to another human being in friendship or acquaintance.

Suspicion, curiosity, and in some cases, antagonism are expressed in most of the students' actions, because their attitude has not been changed by the spirit of love and justice. Most students think the best way "to get him out" is to ignore him. Yet, there are others who think he should be at Clemson if he is qualified, and these admire him for his stand.

Religious Leaders Urge Action

(Special Correspondent)

CHICAGO, Ill.—A major event in race relations was the National Conference on Religion and Race held here in January.

About 700 Roman Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant leaders attended. It was the first such national gathering convened by all the major faiths in the United States. A number of Southern ministers and laymen, Negro and white, attended.

The conference seemed to many a significant breakthrough in the awakening of the nation's religious forces to work for an end to racial barriers. In a final statement, the conference called racism "our most serious domestic evil" and said:

"We Americans of all religious faiths have been slow to recognize that racial discrimination and segregation are an insult to God, the giver of human dignity and human rights. Even worse, we all have participated in pepetuating racial discrimination in civil, political, social and private life."

But the conference was more than statements. There were workshops that came out with very specific suggestions as to what each person could go back home and do.

One of the main speakers was Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and he called on delegates not to let the conference end up in a "paralysis of analysis."

He said the church should "take the lead in social reform. . . . remove the yoke of segregation from its own body" and "become increasingly active in social action outside its doors."

Another Southern speaker was the Rev. Will D. Campbell, Nashville, associate director, Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches.

He said that rather than looking for an answer to the race problems through the inner life of church and synagogue, it may be that it is through an honest approach to race that the church and synagogue can find and achieve its true "inner life."

Many of the speakers called dramatic attention to the failure of the church and synagogue to practice what it preaches. Rabbi Abraham J. Heschel of Jewish Theological Seminary, New York, said: "By negligence and silence we have all become accessories before the God of mercy to the injustice committed against the Negroes of our nation . . . Indifference to evil is more insidious than evil itself . . . more universal, more contagious, more dangerous. . ."

Prof. Franklin H. Littell of Chicago Theological Seminary, said the choice before the Protestant churches is clear: "The old America of white, rural and Protestant dominance is dying. . . . Either they can accept the logic voluntaristic and pluralistic situation, wherein lies their true genius. . . . or they can end up as embittered and negative minorities which the course of history has passed by."

Among the specific suggestions from the workshops were: direct action projects by groups of laymen against segregation, campaigns for open occupancy housing pledges from church members, use of church or synagogue as a "service center" for buyers and sellers in interracial housing, efforts in behalf of laws to enforce fair housing and employment, investment of church funds in interracial housing and development of church-sponsored "Justice Corps" for work in nonviolent protest and voter registration in difficult areas.

Over and over its was stressed that "the most effective education is education of the deed."

One of the South's most militant civil rights leaders, the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth, an SCEF director who attended the conference, commented afterwards that it was a "giant step in the right direction" toward the activation of the church for its "true mission." He said he would like to see such conference on the local level in Southern cities.

Against HUAC

WASHINGTON, D.C. — At least 84 congressmen were prepared to vote their opposition to the House Un-American Activities Committee as Congress opened this year, but were denied the right to do so because Speaker John McCormack refused to give the floor to representatives who wanted to present resolutions against the committee. much to the optimist, but there is hope in the actions already expressed by several students. What they do will quiet the fears of those who want to express themselves to another human being in friendship or acquaintance.

Suspicion, curiosity, and in some cases, antagonism are expressed in most of the students' actions, because their attitude has not been changed by the spirit of love and justice. Most students think the best way "to get him out" is to ignore him. Yet, there are others who think he should be at Clemson if he is qualified, and these admire him for his stand.

"—Dear Ol' Golden Rule Days—"

Time alone will not change the Southern attitude — understanding and loving people will. More and more students will come to accept Harvey Gantt as a person and not as a Negro who broke down the barrier of racial discrimination.

I say this with others with faith in God as progress is made to place beside the name of South Carolina and the United States: "Equality and Justice."

Tougaloo Student Wins Award

CHICAGO, Ill. — The United Packinghouse Workers announced that its annual Russell Bull Scholarship for "outstanding contribution in the area of civil rights or liberties" was divided between two students. One is Miss Joan Trumpauer, a white student at predominantly Negro Tougaloo College in Jackson, Miss. (See September Patriot for Miss Trumpauer's account of her experiences there.)

The other recipient was David W. Johnson, a graduate of Ball State College, Muncie, Ind. now doing graduate work, for his leadership in a campaign to end discriminatory off-campus housing.

Applications for the 1963-64 Russell Bull Award must be in by March 30. Inquiries may be sent to Ralph Helstein, Room 1800, 608 S. Dearborn, Chicago. The award is $1000.

gro sections of Jackson, attempting without success to apprehend the leaflet distributors.

Late one night, shortly before Christmas, a bullet was fired through a window in our home where our 10-month-old baby, Maria, lay sleeping—but she was unhurt.

A sign found on our lawn indicated that someone felt us to be "poor white trash." Strange cars were reported on the Tougaloo campus—cars filled with white men.

Work on the boycott continued right along—and still does. In an associated realm, the legal defense maneuvers promise to be more than a little unique. Our attorneys—William Kunstler and Clarence Jones, both of New York City, and R. Jess Brown of Jackson—filed a petition to get our cases out of the state courts into Federal court on a primarily First Amendment basis.

When a segregationist-oriented, Eastland-sponsored Federal judge, Harold Cox, appointed himself to hear the petition, we immediately filed a second petition—charging bias on his part and asking that he disqualify himself.

We shall win in the courts and, although it will take awhile, we shall win our boycott demands: equality in hiring and promotion, an end to segregated facilities in the stores, use of courtesy titles, and service on a first-come first-served basis.

We shall win because we have unity. Initiated by the Jackson-area NAACP youth, the boycott was immediately backed by NAACP at all levels and by CORE and SNCC. Bail bond has been provided by NAACP, SCEF, the Gandhi Society for Human Rights (associated with SCLC,) and interested individuals. Legal defense has been provided by the Gandhi Society and the NAACP.

We shall win because we have students and adults who are willing to do the things necessary: to continue the picketing, of which there will be much more; to add thousands more leaflets to the 25,000 already distributed; to continue the countless telephone calls; to attend the innumerable church services and other meetings as speakers; and to cook the food and coffee.

And we are going to win because we have the people behind us—people who are learning quickly indeed the power of money on strike.

The solidarity of those people will win in the courts and it will win in the boycott, and it will go on to win a democratic Mississippi. It will crack things open and then it will build.

Atlanta Drive

ATLANTA, Ga.—Over 500 social and civic clubs are supporting a selective buying campaign launched by 400 Negro ministers here against Highland Bakeries. The campaign started after the negotiations for upgrading and hiring of Negroes on skilled jobs failed.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) is cooperating in the campaign, and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., SCLC president, indicated there may soon be a nationwide conference on selective buying programs.

Forman Ill

JIM FORMAN, hard-working executive secretary of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), became critically ill in January and was hospitalized for a bleeding ulcer. Forman is one of the people who has welded SNCC into fast-moving action organization that it is, often working around the clock and neglecting to eat to do it. Students in various parts of the country rushed to volunteer blood for the widely-respected leader, who required repeated transfusions for a week. He is now released from the hospital, resting at home, and hopes to be back on the job soon.

You Can Stay at Home and Help

Wherever you live, you can help the people who are organizing for justice in Jackson, Miss. Seventeen of the stores under boycott there are national chains.

The Jackson movement asks you to (1) withdraw your trade from them, (2) tell your friends to do likewise and take it up with your local organization, (3) write the stores telling them why you are doing it, and (4) picket them if you can.

The stores are: Bakers Shoes, Bell Brothers Shoes, Bomar Shoes, Butler's Shoes, Grayson's Dress Shops, H. L. Green (dime stores), J. C. Penney, Lerner's Dress Shops, National Shirt Shops, Nora Day Shops (women's wear), Owens Ltd. (men's clothing), Parisian (women's wear), Schwobilt (men's clothing), Shainbergs (dept. stores), Thom McAn Shoes, Walgreen Drugs, Woolworth.

The Jackson people would like to hear from you as to what you are doing. Write North Jackson NAACP Youth Council, Box 13, Tougaloo Southern Christian College, Tougaloo, Miss.

Citizens Assail 'The Wall' in Atlanta

PART OF THE CROWD that entirely hid the 'Atlanta wall' from view during a recent protest meeting there. At right is the way the 'wall,' a buffer erected by the city to stop Negro housing advancement, looks when uncovered. (See January Patriot.) The protest meeting was called by the All-Citizens Committee for Better City Planning, a coalition group which includes all Negro leadership groups opposing the wall. Working closely with this committee is an interracial group, the Atlanta Council on Human Relations, which sent representatives to an aldermanic hearing before the wall was erected and urged the aldermen not to do it, and which is continuing to encourage opposition throughout the community. The council of the Episcopal Diocese of Atlanta also called for removal of the barriers. The struggle points up rising concern over housing segregation in the South.

I told them how students in the Deep South were risking their lives every day by standing up for their principles. I think the example of these students will inspire them to take a firm stand.

I explained to him that most of the people who would be at the conference believed in democracy and that was the main reason they would be there—to try to make it work.

"Sounds communist to me," he said.

After visiting colleges in Texas, I arrived in Dallas for the conference and was pleased to find that many of the schools I had visited were represented.

project, called it a "beacon of hope to the Negroes in all this part of Georgia." Finally it appeared that the Federal Government was moving in their support. There was a sudden spurt of people going to register in Terrell County. People who had stayed away from registration meetings since Negro churches were burned here last summer began to come back.

And then came the letdown. Short was tried at the end of January. An all-white jury deliberated 33 minutes and set him free.

The students immediately put the blame on the Federal Government. They were outraged at the way the Justice Department lawyers conducted the trial.

"They wanted us to act like 'Uncle Toms'," said Sherrod. "They told us to stay 'Yes sir' and 'No sir' on the witness stand, to say 'colored people' instead of 'Negro' so we wouldn't upset the jury. They told a Negro student to take her hat off because her dignified dress might offend Sasser farmers." (She didn't.)

The lawyers, the students said, fraternized with local officials and took pains to assure the jurors that they were also "Southern boys." One of them stated repeatedly during the trial that they took no position on whether what the students were doing in Southwest Georgia was right or wrong. ("In 10 years, these students themselves may feel it was wrong," he added), and that their only interest was law and order.

Worst of all, they failed to invite the press to the trial and insisted to the students that they issue no releases on it. They said they didn't want a lot of publicity to create tension and "panic the judge," the students reported.

Sherrod made it clear that he did not think the Government lawyers deliberately "threw the case." According to their lights, they were apparently sincerely seeking a conviction. But they tried to get it by catering to the prejudices of the local community and protecting it from the spotlight of national opinion. The verdict was eloquent proof that such accommodation simply will not defeat Southern racists.

If they had fought the case on an aggressive, principled basis, it probably would not have affected the verdict. But it would have strengthened local Negroes with the knowledge that Washington really means to fight for them, and it would have made the case a kickoff for a crusade that could win.

For if the Justice Department had let the press of the nation know that the Kennedy Administration considered this a vital case and the registration efforts of Georgia Negroes a matter of crucial concern to the nation, the world would have known about Deputy Short. This might not have helped in this case, but it could have made a difference next time.

If a few civil-rights organizations could stir the protests that won the two cases described on page 1, what would happen if the White House but Negro students could not use the dining room or student center.

The Wesley Foundation group wanted to invite the students to use the lounge and other facilities of the Wesley Center, but they said the Center board of trustees, composed of local white Methodists, had threatened to close the building if Negroes were welcomed there.

The group said the building was new and they had worked very hard to get it; they asked me what I would do in this situation.

I told them I couldn't advise them to do anything, that they had to decide for themselves. But I told them my personal lives every day by standing up for their principles. I think the example of these students will inspire them to take a firm stand.

At Centenary College in Shreveport, La., I had an interesting experience. Vivien Franklin, who was directing the SSACC conference, had given me only one student's name at Centenary. I found him and inquired if he and others might be able to attend the conference. He said, "What kind of conference is this now?"

I said: "A conference of students who are interested in social issues, improving the racial situation in the Southwest, for instance."

"Improving it how?" he asked warily.

"By doing away with the system of segregation," I said.

He said, "Look, mister, you got the wrong man. I'm a Baptist and we believe in separation of the races. God planned it that way. What system of government do y'all believe in anyway?"

After visiting colleges in Texas, I arrived in Dallas for the conference and was pleased to find that many of the schools I had visited were represented.

The SSACC conference was the first attempt to start a student civil rights movement in the Southwest with action groups on individual campuses. About 75 white and Negro students attended, representing more than 20 schools.

Students reported on their campus and community situations, and there were several lectures and panel discussions. Civil rights were discussed as they relate to politics, economics, civil liberties, academic freedom, and world peace. There were discussions of nonviolent direct action (NVDA) and also of voter registration. Speakers included a number of regional and local leaders.

I felt that the conference indicated the need that Southwestern students are feeling for a liberal, interracial movement which will —as the Southern students have done and are doing—change the face of their region.

The movement has hardly begun in the Southwest, but resistance there is less, and great success is possible.

SSACC will, I hope, give students the tool with which (in the words of the poet) to "post proofs that Brotherhood is not so wild a dream as those who profit by postponing it pretend."

The Pursuit of Zellner

Bob Zellner, author of the above article, is a native white Southern student who has placed himself directly in the front lines of struggle with young Negroes—and he has been the recipient of that special fury segregationists reserve for the white Southerner who does this.

He's been jailed for criminal anarchy in Louisiana, conspiracy in Alabama, and assorted other charges in Georgia and Mississippi.

His latest persecution occurred (after the above article was written) in Montgomery, Ala., when he was arrested on the campus of his alma mater, Huntingdon College, on a charge of vagrancy.

Police then added a charge of "false pretenses" over a check Bob had written. The charge carries a 10-year sentence.

(Bob wrote the check with reason to believe certain funds had been deposited to his account but, through an error, they had not been. Police checked with the bank; the check was never presented for payment; if it had been, the funds would have been there when it cleared through normal channels.)

After he was released on bond, state police followed him everywhere he went and trailed him to Mobile, Ala., where they created a state of terror among relatives and friends during the last illness and funeral of Bob's grandmother.

Bob's father, who is a Methodist minister, and his mother both made appeals to the police to go away and leave the family in peace during the funeral but to no avail. The agents later followed Bob and his father into Florida.

SCEF, SNCC, and other groups have protested the harassment as a "disgrace to America" in communications to Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace, State Attorney General Richmond Flowers in Montgomery, Ala., and to the U.S. Justice Department and the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights in Washington. You are urged to add your protest.

probably would not have affected the verdict. But it would have strengthened local Negroes with the knowledge that Washington really means to fight for them, and it would have made the case a kickoff for a crusade that could win.

For if the Justice Department had let the press of the nation know that the Kennedy Administration considered this a vital case and the registration efforts of Georgia Negroes a matter of crucial concern to the nation, the world would have known about Deputy Short. This might not have helped in this case, but it could have made a difference next time.

If a few civil-rights organizations could stir the protests that won the two cases described on page 1, what would happen if the White House led the outcry of indignant national opinion against atrocities in the South?

After the Short acquittal, Sherrod issued an open statement to the President and Attorney-General. "Must we die before the Federal Government stops compromising. . .?" he asked. "If we are murdered in our efforts to make real the tenets of democracy, our blood will be on your hands. . ."

There are things Washington can do. If Southern juries won't convict, there are always injunctions and contempt actions before a Federal judge—if you have a decent Federal judge, and Kennedy appoints the judges. Also, Federal agent's can be placed on the scene to protect civil rights workers. But nothing will change until Washington realizes that the fight can't be won by compromising with racists.

Challenge in Alabama

(By Staff Correspondent)

HUNTSVILLE, Ala.—The University of Alabama canceled an extension course offered here after a Negro woman applied for admission.

Officials at the university's Huntsville Center said it was because they could not get speakers needed for the course, a six-week seminar on current affairs. But integration leaders say they are sure the cancellation was because Mrs. John Cashin, wife of a local dentist, applied.

They point out that officials stopped all admissions to the main university at Tuscaloosa for this semester after Negroes applied there. The Huntsville extension is especially vulnerable, as it is used by many students from Redstone Arsenal near here, which is operated by the Federal Government. Civil rights leaders point out that listings of courses are posted regularly at the Arsenal to encourage employees to qualify for advancement, although Negro Arsenal employees cannot attend the University extension.

Mrs. Cashin has been active in many desegregation efforts here.

Little Rock Action Opens Counters

(By Special Correspondent)

LITTLE ROCK, Ark.—Several lunch counters, some hotels and a bowling alley desegregated peacefully here in January.

The victory came after local students, affiliated with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, staged sit-ins and marches in the fall. These were the first demonstrations against segregation here in two years.

Bill Hanson, SNCC field worker, and Worth Long, Philander Smith College student, were arrested during a sit-in in November. This sparked more demonstrations.

Meantime, action is spreading to other parts of Arkansas. Hanson and Ben Grinage, also a SNCC field worker, and Leon Nash, student at Arkansas A.M. & N. College, were recently arrested on vagrancy charges in Pine Bluff.

In Ft. Smith, Ark., lunch counters at three dime stores desegregated in January as a result of a negotiations by the local CORE group.

Operation Freedom Expands to Mississippi

(By Staff Correspondent)

CINCINNATI, Ohio — In the spring of 1961, when landlords in Haywood and Fayette Counties, Tenn., were evicting Negroes who registered to vote and banks were cutting off their credit, a group of concerned citizens came together here and formed an organization to help.

The organization was called Operation Freedom. It launched a nationwide drive to raise money to enable the Negroes of West Tennessee to survive economically as they organized to win their freedom at the ballot box.

During the past two years, Operation Freedom has loaned over $80,000 to Negroes (and a few white supporters also suffering reprisals) in Haywood and Fayette Counties. Ten times that much could have been put to good use, but with what was available Operation Freedom has made it possible for scores of families who would otherwise have had to leave to stay in West Tennessee.

Now the problem that Operation Freedom was set up to meet has expanded into the Mississippi Delta, and Operation Freedom is expanding with it.

its dimensions are tremendous. To meet it even partially, Operation Freedom will need more money than it has ever had before. But, in the words of one official of the organization, "the task is too important to the entire future of democracy for us to even think of saying 'we can't'."

The Delta area of Mississippi covers 18 counties (see map) and includes some of the richest farming land in the world. In this area live approximately 300,000 Negroes—about two-thirds of the total population and in one county as much as 79 per cent.

Until recently, virtually no Negroes in this area were registered to vote, and the number is still minute because officials use every possible device to prevent it. But in the past year, intensive registration drives have been launched in the area by several civil rights organizations.

And when the registration efforts stepped up, the reprisals began. In some cases there has been violence: homes have been shot into; two student registration workers in LeFlore County narrowly escaped being lynched.

But when people make up their minds to be free, terror that will be used to (1) enable those who have land to make their crops when banks cut them off from credit; (2) stop foreclosures on homes and farm equipment; and (3) help landless Negroes who lose their jobs survive until a permanent solution is found.

Three well-known leaders in the Delta, Aaron Henry, Bob Moses, and Amzie Moore, are among those working with Operation Freedom in setting up the necessary machinery.

The money from Operation Freedom is generally made available to those who need it in the form of loans, although outright grants are sometimes made when it is necessary. Local committees will process loan applications. The loan fund is revolving, and as loans are repaid, the money can be loaned out again.

A student registration worker recently said: "The success of our program depends on the protection we can offer the individual while he is waiting for his one small vote to become part of a strong social-political structure."

This is Operation Freedom's job. It is your job too. The article at the bottom of this page tells you what you can do.

use, but with what was available civil rights organizations.

Operation Freedom has made it possible for scores of families who would otherwise have had to leave to stay in West Tennessee.

Now the problem that Operation Freedom was set up to meet has expanded into the Mississippi Delta, and Operation Freedom is expanding with it.

It has voted to extend its operations into the Delta area and attempt to do there what it has been doing and will continue to do in Tennessee: in the words of its charter, "promote brotherhood, especially by helping to secure the economic conditions conducive of the free exercise of civil rights."

The need in the Delta is crucial;

And when the registration efforts stepped up, the reprisals began. In some cases there has been violence: homes have been shot into; two student registration workers in LeFlore County narrowly escaped being lynched.

But when people make up their minds to be free, terror of this kind won't stop them. The most effective weapon the segregationists have—and they know it—is economic pressure.

In the Delta, as in West Tennessee, people who try to register are being put off the land, fired from their jobs, and cut off from credit.

Operation Freedom proposes to defeat this weapon with a fund

What Will You Do?

Operation Freedom appeals to people throughout the nation to help it meet the challenge in Mississippi and West Tennessee. This is what you can do:

1. Send money to Operation Freedom, c/o the Rev. Maurice McCrackin, 932 Dayton St., Cincinnati 14, Ohio, to assist those harassed for trying to vote. Make your gift as generous as you can, but do not let the magnitude of the need make you feel that only large gifts are solicited. Whether yours is a dollar or several thousand dollars, it is needed.

2. Write to Operation Freedom at the above address, obtain additional literature and take this matter up with your church, with other organizations to which you belong, and with your individual friends.

3. Send to Operation Freedom suggested names of persons and organizations to whom they may appeal for funds.

4. Better still, order descriptive literature from Operation Freedom and do your own mailing to a list of your friends or enclose in a regular mailing to your organization. Operation Freedom runs on a shoestring, so has little money for postage. (See page 2 for OF structure.)

(All contributions to Operation Freedom are deductible for income tax purposes.)

AFTER 35 YEARS on one plantation, this woman was driven off the land for registering to vote. She is typical of thousands being harassed in Mississippi and Tennessee and for whom Operation Freedom is seeking help.

—Southern Patriot Map

THIS IS THE DELTA of Mississippi, core of the segregation problem in the United States. At its heart is the huge plantation of U.S. Senator James O. Eastland, who leads the attacks on integrationists and others favoring civil rights. Geographers don't agree as to the precise area of the Delta, but it is generally considered to be 18 counties east of the Mississippi River between Memphis and Vicksburg. It is an alluvial plain formed by the river and should not be confused with the delta of the river itself, which is in Louisiana (see inset map). North of the Delta are Fayette and Haywood Counties, Tennessee, where Negroes have been harassed as they are in the Delta. Jackson, the state capital, and Oxford, scene of the riots at Ole Miss, are to the east of the Delta. Indianola in Sunflower County (where the Eastland plantation is located) is where the White Citizens Council movement had its origin. Nearby is the home of Robert "Tut" Patterson, national executive secretary of the WCC.

'When Thousands Suffer'

Returning from a two-week tour of the Mississippi Delta, Jack McKart of Ohio, coordinator for Operation Freedom, wrote:

"I wish every person in this country could visit Mississippi . . . sit as I have in the cold sharecroppers' cabins with coat on . . . see the hunger and the children out of school because they have no adequate clothes . . . see the bullet holes in the homes of registration workers . . . hear of the young women shot there who lay unattended for two hours in a white hospital . . . talk to the young man just out of jail charged with telephoning a white woman . . . hear of the mutilated body found near Canton. . . .

"You have to be there to believe it. When I told one Northern minister about these things, he said 'Don't take it too seriously, that sort of thing has been happening a long time in the South.' This minister is not a segregationist, he is not an evil man. He would do anything to help a hungry family next door—people he could see. Most people would. But it is so hard to comprehend when thousands of people are suffering, when a whole state is suffering. I guess that is why the Germans couldn't comprehend about 6 million Jews in gas chambers. It was too big. They didn't see the human beings. It was just an abstraction—like Mississippi to many people now. When you see, you have to act. I wish everyone could go and see for themselves."

Who Is O.F.?

Operation Freedom (OF) is a group of individuals, all of whom have their primary work in other areas, who have come together for the single purpose for which OF was formed.

It is an ad hoc group to meet a special emergency and will go out of existence when that emergency is past. But that time is not yet.

Among its founders and leaders, all of whom have devoted much time to its work are:

The Rev. Clarence T. R. Nelson, who serves as chairman of OF. He is now pastor of Scott Memorial Methodist Church, Detroit, was formerly district superintendent in the Lexington Conference the groups that helped found it. As coordinator, he will be working with persons getting help in Tennessee and Mississippi as well as those who provide funds.

It should be noted that no funds for Jack's expenses or the other minimal administrative costs of OF are taken out of money raised for the loan fund. Every cent given in response to appeals like the present one goes to people in Tennessee and Mississippi. Administrative funds are raised occasionally through special appeals for that purpose.

Besides the officers, other members of the OF Board of Trustees are the Rev. Samuel Beaty, Anne Braden, Rabbi Stanley Bray

You Can Help

The People Who Make History

(By Staff Correspondent)

CLEVELAND, Miss. — Who are the people who come to Operation Freedom for help? Here are some typical cases:

● A man in a small Delta town was employed in the city sanitation department. His wife went to register to vote. He was fired. She lost her job as a cleaning woman in a public building. They have a son. They own their own house but have a $800 mortgage on it.

Occasionally they get odd jobs; friends and food collected in food drives over the nation enable them to eat; if they can get a long-term loan from OF to pay off that house mortgage, they may be able to survive.

Asked how she feels about registering after all the trouble she has had, this woman said: "I feel wonderful about it. I'd do it over again."

● Another man, his wife, and seven children worked on a plantation. His mother tried to register. He was fired. He got a job in a plant in a small town. People from the plantation found out about it, got him fired.

Meantime, his wife got a job as a cook in the cafeteria of a white school. Someone who had known her on the plantation saw her there, got her fired. She told OF: "I don't know how we will live, we have no money and no food."

This family needs a monthly subsidy on a long-term loan basis, until some permanent solution brochure, Operation Freedom said:

"Action for freedom in Montgomery meant staying off the buses. In Greensboro it meant eating at lunch counters. In Birmingham and Jackson it meant walking into waiting rooms. In Haywood and Fayette Counties, Tenn., it means registering to vote."

That is also what it means now in the Mississippi Delta. All through this area, people are glimpsing a vision of what the vote can mean. They know the danger, but when they go to the registrar's office, they are taking their stand.

Economic strangulation is the only weapon strong enough to defeat them; if the people who believe in democracy provide the money to help them defeat this weapon, they will win. It is as simple as that.

An emergency program like that of Operation Freedom cannot solve the problem forever. For Negroes without jobs or land, there must eventually be other solutions—perhaps cooperatives, government redevelopment programs, new industry. But these things take time, and meantime people must live this year and next if they are to stay. Operation Freedom can provide the stop-gap.

It can also let the Negroes of Mississippi know they are not alone, let them know that as they lift their eyes toward freedom there are people all over America, white and Negro, who are grateful for their courage and who care enough to give of their own substance in support.

In Tennessee . . . .

OPERATION Freedom provided funds to build this house for David Mac Jones, oldest voter in Haywood County, Tenn., when he and wife were evicted in 1961 from land where he had lived since childhood. At lower right is M. B. Hines, another registered voter in Hay-not yet.

Among its founders and leaders, all of whom have devoted much time to its work are:

The Rev. Clarence T. R. Nelson, who serves as chairman of OF. He is now pastor of Scott Memorial Methodist Church, Detroit, was formerly district superintendent in the Lexington Conference of the Methodist Church. He was born in Arkansas and is himself a former sharecropper.

Miriam Nicholas, co-chairman. She is active in integration and peace activities in Cincinnati.

The Rev. L. Richard Hudson, secretary. He is pastor of Forest Park Christian Church, Cincinnati, and director of New Church Development, Cincinnati.

The Rev. Maurice F. McCrackin, treasurer. He is a nationally known leader in integration and peace movements and pastor of Community Church of Cincinnati.

Ernest Bromley, corresponding secretary. He has long been associated with the Peacemaker movement and edits its publication.

Coordinator

Until recently, OF functioned entirely on volunteer labor, and still does to a large extent. But because of the size of the task it faces in expanding into Mississippi, it has temporarily named a full-time coordinator.

He is Jack McKart, a student taking time off from his studies to do this job. He is working for expenses only and friends everywhere are urged to provide him with food and lodging when he comes your way.

Jack is from Hamilton, Ohio. He became interested in OF through the Peacemakers, one of given in response to appeals like the present one goes to people in Tennessee and Mississippi. Administrative funds are raised occasionally through special appeals for that purpose.

Different Need

Operation Freedom is not to be confused with the current emergency drives in a number of cities to collect food and clothing or money to buy these items for hungry people in Mississippi. These are much needed too, and The Patriot urges its readers to give them full support. But Operation Freedom serves a different need.

The food drives meet the immediate hunger problem. Operation Freedom hopes to provide larger sums for a variety of needs—crop loans, rent payments, mortgages, etc. — and thus make it possible for Negro voters to survive and stay in Tennessee and Mississippi long enough to find a permanent means of income.

a white school. Someone who had known her on the plantation saw her there, got her fired. She told OF: "I don't know how we will live, we have no money and no food."

This family needs a monthly subsidy on a long-term loan basis, until some permanent solution can be found for them.

● Another man is lucky enough to own some land. His farm also provides a living to two other families who live and work there. But like other farmers, he must borrow money each spring for seed and fertilizer and gasoline for his tractor—and for "run money" to keep his own family and his tenants going until the crop is harvested in the fall.

In the past, he has borrowed money from a local bank. But now he is working on voter registration, so his credit is cut off. He needs a crop loan from Operation Freedom.

Multiply these cases by the hundreds, and you get a picture of the problems in the Delta.

A field worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee reported that the mayor of one Delta town threatened local Negroes connected with the voter registration drive by saying; "We're going to see how tight we can make it—it's going to be rough, rougher than you think." A voting Negro population in Mississippi will change this state and eventually the nation, and those who fear the change know it.

The battle for the ballot is the front line of the freedom struggle in Mississippi today. In an early evicted in 1961 from land where he had lived since childhood. At lower right is M. B. Hines, another registered voter in Haywood County, whose tractor was saved from foreclosure by a loan from Operation Freedom. These cases are typical of the assistance OF has provided in Tennessee.

.... In Mississippi

TYPICAL of the heroic people in Mississippi who are risking death as well as economic strangulation to win the vote is Mrs. Joseph MacDonald, Ruleville, (right) who points to bullet holes fired into her home from a speeding car. Her husband formerly made his living by hauling laborers to Delta plantations; after he became active in registration drive, land-owners refused to do business with him. Below another active couple, Mr. and Mrs. Herman Sisson, examine holes from bullets fired into their home. Two young women were wounded by these bullets.

Read This Book: It Documents the Need

"The Segregationists," a new book by James Graham Cook, tells how the planters in Mississippi laid plans years ago for using the economic squeeze to stop Negroes from registering to vote. This book is required reading for those who seek fuller understanding of the crisis in Mississippi, as well as the rest of the South.

Cook is a native of Alabama who has worked for several news media in the South, including the Memphis Commercial Appeal. He is a thorough and honest reporter with an intimate knowledge of his subject, which is the people and organizations that keep the segregation machinery going. These people have more power and connections than is generally realized.

Publisher of "The Segregationists" is Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc., 35 W. 32nd St., New York 1, N.Y. The book has 363 pages and an index. Price is $5.95.

Comments on the Metabagdad Conference in

Atlanta, Georgia

February 4-6, 1964

In response to the invitation of the Rev. James Morton to write concerning the conference

JOHN L. EBAUGH, JR.

To All Conferees:

The conference was well organized; the problems were presented in a lucid and accurate manner. Our conclusions were a shock to me. I am reminded of some words in the address which President Kennedy would have delivered in Dallas had he not been shot first. They concerned those "who confuse rhetoric with reality and the plausible with the possible, who would gain the ascendency with their seemingly swift and simple solutions to every problem."

I felt foolish as I told of my experiences as a lay reader, but the objections (*) to Bishop Henry's proposal to use more often the services of lay people – some ordained – goaded my speech.

When a distraught woman asked me to be parole adviser for her husband so he could be released from federal prison, it never occurred to me to figure out a theology on the subject. I just signed for him, brought him home, spent endless hours with a bitterly resentful man until he was calm enough to be fit for a job, got him a job as a cost accountant where he would not be tempted again to embezzle, and delivered him totally free two years later as a reasonably stable and useful member of the social order.

When confronted with illiterate people displaced from rural slums by economic changes, my Christian associates did not know enough to think in theological terms. They started a Sunday School in the City Hall above the jail (probably unconstitutional now) where we could salvage their children. We worked closely with relief case workers and the police. Teenagers were trained in useful skills and a desire to serve. We could bring to bear the power of the Holy Ghost, without which relief is doomed to failure. Then something happened. Two ex-convicts, who had spent many drunken Sundays cursing in jail while their children were in Sunday School upstairs, came asking for help. They, too, were trained to work; jobs were found. They supported their families and walked soberly erect as respected members of society. Others followed. The elders are dead, but it is a marvelous thing to see their children as responsible parents and useful people.

Over 500 times I have exercised the right granted me by two Bishops of Alabama to preach sermons of my own composition. I'll never forget how it started. About a year after my confirmation, I was in a vacant store with some forty others for a Sunday service of Morning Prayer. The minister failed to come, so I, as warden, had to read the service. I did, including rubrics and absolution, and I delivered a sermon. The next day Bishop McDowell made it legal with a license. I have never been instructed in theology and don't know much about it. When I preach, I get on my knees and say, "God, I'll open my mouth; you tell me what to say." He usually does.

That congregation now has over 700 communicants, two priests, a parish day school of over 260 children and an active Sunday School of over 450 people. Four rectors and two curates have served since that Sunday in the store. Two priests were ordained from the congregation (including my son), three postulants from us are in seminary, and six priests ordained elsewhere had significant experiences with us first. Many Christians had a part in this result. They were not hurt by ignorance nor the fact that I am a sinner.

As lay reader, I have presented over fifty people for confirmation. They were instructed after a fashion. They learned to find their way in the Book of Common Prayer and the Bible. They were shown the passages in the Bible quoted closely or verbatim in 85% of the Prayer Book. Every confession and absolution was examined to get the sequence of sin, repentance, confession and forgiveness. We read the service of Holy Communion carefully, especially the memorial to Jesus and the dedication in the last paragraph on page 81. We were to confess belief in the creeds, so we studied them. Most of all, we were to agree to follow Jesus, so we looked at His Person, life, death, and resurrection to see where we might go. When questions of death and resurrection arose, we read the burial service, and we let the Book of Common Prayer or the Epistles answer other questions. Some of these fifty are pretty good Christians.

An Atlanta layman at the Conference said that I had been responsible for influencing him to confirmation about fifteen years ago. I did not remember it. I met him at a lay conference in Sewanee. He was there because some one else brought him; others helped him to a final decision. Quite a number of others have told me the same thing from time to time and there must be more that I don't know about. Lay people come to my office in considerable numbers for consultations when they are troubled. These things don't just happen. I am persuaded that the Holy Spirit of God takes a hand now and then. I have not figured out the theology.

The laymen of our Metabagdad (Birmingham) have an association called the Jefferson Count Churchmen's Association. (The Metabagdad which we considered had no such intercongregational co-operation.) It has its ups and downs. But our mission to the deaf lost its building to termites; the association rebuilt it. Our Belmont Heights had no church fifteen years ago. Several attempts were made by individual parishes to start one without success. The association formed a committee from four congregations which had communicants in the area. Seventy-five people came out on a bitter cold, sleeting January night, named the new congregation St. Luke's, elected some trustees and went to work. Four rectors came to the meeting; one "to protect his congregation", the other three to help organize the new one. It is now the largest parish in Alabama; and the other four parishes are larger than they were. As far as I know, no one thought to figure out a theology. Jesus took care of that over 1900 years ago with his command to go out and tell what things we have seen and heard.

Several other congregations have been formed here. Lay readers have gone out regularly for years; to the jail as well as to the pulpit. In 1891, I am quite sure that a lay reader, business man and mayor of our infant city, Mr. James A. van Hoose, was concerned much more with the illiterate Negro population and their welfare than with theology when he organized our first school and church for Negroes. The school became a pilot school and model for the public schools for nearly fifty years. It had a proud history of real service, supported in very large measure by the Diocesan Programme and the American Church Institute for Negroes.

No other member of the Atlanta conference desires more than I that we shall have a trained and educated clergy. The Church must have its Saints John and Paul. But it also sorely needs fishermen who may not know very much except how to be good fishers of men. It desperately needs men in its ordained ministry who understand that, at best, no one of us glimpses more than a tiny fragment of Truth; and what each comes upon is never identical to another's fragment. We are all ignorant on different subjects; all see through a glass darkly. It is long past time for educated clergymen and educated laymen to parallel their knowledge to achieve a common purpose instead of working at cross purposes as we are doing now in increasing degree.

What has this to do with Metabagdad? Very much, I think. In Atlanta, we looked at a sick metropolitan area. In a few short days we recommended the formation of numerous committees, called on the Governor and the "power structure" of the community, had a ready solution for nearly every problem. We solved tensions resulting from teenage vandalism; expansion of cities; zoning; the location and use of a highway, a hospital and a school; the formation of a stock yard; an influx of 10,000 people; a sick industry with labor trouble; unemployment; and numerous other political and economic problems. Every solution came complete with theology; none even recognized the basic trouble. I recommended that the Church abandon the Metabagdad project and stand by to pick up the derelicts of a dying community. (Its Chamber of Commerce projects growth; its death rattle is apparent.)

Metabagdad is not a community. It is a cluster of separate communities, each struggling for its own advantage with no thought of the good of the whole. It had a problem of unemployment but we ruled out the stock feeding facility, which would employ 200 unskilled people, because it might draw flies and stink. The Air Force officers and their families (2,000 men, 10,000 people, $8,000,000 payroll) would create a troublesome housing problem. We worried about the plight of many Negroes and Whites in high density areas in Tolland and Franklin, and then fretted because a throughway plan would cause some to move. We worried about lack of employment, but demanded that a sick industry employ persons not needed. (One of us said that it is better for a corporation to go bankrupt than the people, as if those were the alternatives.) We noted with disapproval that a Savings and Loan Association refused to finance homes in an area of racial tension. Many thought that the hospital and college should be located elsewhere, but we were sure that the "power structure" would keep them in Tolland for selfish reasons.

It did not occur to many of us that such institutions employ highly trained people and also many with little or no skill at all. The sub-committee concerning the school caught a vision of its possible usefulness where it is; but what about the hospital?

We did not discern a community so selfish and hostile to outsiders that no business man in his right mind would go there with a factory or other facility. If I had one there, I would not expand it and I would move it at the first opportunity. We made plans costing many millions of dollars and made no plan whatever to get the money with which to pay. When I raised these questions, our group merely reported that we had a long discussion of economics. Until we recognize some basic facts of economic life and how they affect the lives of people, our influence upon any society toward any goal will be sterile.

There is a great misconception about money. The dollar is a unit of measure with no more intrinsic worth than a second of time or a cubic foot of space. But the life or death of a whole community is measured by the ebb and flow of its dollars. The Rice County Paper Corporation cannot pay its employees with tons of inedible paper. It must make its payroll in dollars. The keeper of the vinyard did not pay his help with grapes; he paid them with money. To the business community, these facts are so elemental that it comes as a shock to find anyone who does not understand them.

And there is the matter of a profit! When a farmer consumes everything that he produces, there is no profit He cannot be self-sufficient; neither can he buy anything from any one else. His standard of living is on a subsistence level; he cannot improve it. If he would improve himself, he must produce a surplus (profit) with which to buy what others sell so he can produce more while working less. The same thing is true of the Rice County Paper Corporation or any other corporation. Indeed, the law applies to a whole community. Churches, schools, libraries, sewer systems and all of the other community services can be procured only if there is a surplus (profit) from its business enterprises with which to pay for them. Indeed, even government must fail without business profits to provide tax revenue. Let no one think that the Communist system escapes the law. To progress, government owned enterprises also must have profits (or subsidies taxed from the profits of others); else they, too, fail. A profit is that increment of production not consumed in the producing process. It is the totality of all human material progress. If we could somehow see it in terms of human welfare, no Christian could ever again scorn it.

We criticized the Savings and Loan Association for not lending where there is racial tension. Thirty-one thousand people have entrusted their life savings to that institution. Its 6,200 borrowers repay the principal of their loans at the rate of $500,000 per month. This must be kept at work by being loaned again. Management uses every wile to get responsible and stable people to borrow. There are many competitors who also have money to lend. But the managers and directors of such a corporation do not own the money they lend; they are trustees for the depositors, the true owners. Loans may be made only when there is a reasonable expectation of repayment. Where property values are unstable for whatever reason, racial, political, economic, or other, management would violate its trust if it made a loan. (We might try our theology in judgement upon the unfaithful manager who caused his depositors to lose their savings.)

This brings us to the larger question of financing the costly rehabilitation programs for Tolland and its satellite communities. Of Course, the Federal and State governments will take tax money levied on the profits of others to pay a substantial part of the road construction cost. They also will pay for "slum clearance", "urban renewal", hospitals, schools, and certain other facilities. But there will remain much to be paid locally. How? The most likely answer is a bond issue (borrowed money), but immediately there arises the question of community willingness and ability to repay. A community which practically seizes the paper company is a poor risk, indeed. So is one hostile to business and to strangers coming in. How can they repay without a community profit? What chance is there to repay without a healthy climate for business enterprise? Managers of banks, life insurance companies, savings institutions and every other source of capital must decline to buy the bonds of such a community.

We seemed to have an idea that business management has control of its destiny. Such is not true. Customers control. All that a vendor can do is to offer to serve; the customer will make the final decision. The breakfast meeting of Purina dog food salesmen in the room next to our Wednesday celebration of Holy Communion reminded me of a story well known to every salesman. The sales manager, in such a meeting, was trying to pep up his dog food salesmen. He explained how nutricious the product is, how healthy a dog would be after eating it for a month, how its package is attractive, and its price competitive. Said he, "Our sales are down in spite of every advantage. Why?" A salesman's voice replied, "The dogs don't like it." The dogs decided the fate of that enterprise.

The customer is a brutal taskmaster. He demands and gets the most appealing product at the lowest price. A vendor may serve him well for many decades, but the customer will change his supplier at whim or for a minor advantage to himself in price or quality. A corporation with an obsolete plant cannot compete for customers with another possessing an automated plant making a better product for a cheaper price. It will have no customers and cease to employ anyone.

Some of us were worried about a "fair profit" for goods and services. Worry no more! The customer will determine the margin of profit. A "sellers market" is a market of scarcity where customers have little choice but, as long as business is free to compete, other suppliers will enter the field and customers again control. That's why our system is so much more efficient and productive than that of any other nation in the world. We are the only major nation to maintain a "buyers' market". All others, through government controls or cartel agreements, control their customers by maintaining a "sellers' market" of scarcity. Our problem is surplus production (profits). Let's keep it that way, even while we quarrel over the surplus and mourn the passing of businesses which can compete no longer.

We seemed to ignore economic and other reasons in all areas of tension to reach for a racial reason. Even the discussions concerning vandalism committed by a White teen-gang called the Storm Troopers on the golf links of a White men's country club were dominated by racial considerations. There appeared to be an attitude saying that integration of the races must be accomplished as a prerequisite to the resolution of all other tensions. We almost totally ignored the fundamentals in racial problems.

It was generally assumed that Negro areas of Metabagdad are areas of high density, low income people. To a considerable extent such is true, but in the Metabagdad in which I live there are areas of beautiful single family homes with beautiful lawns and shrubs, all occupied by their relatively affluent Negro owners. It is a new phenomenon during the last twenty-five years, arising coincidentally with the recovery of Southern Whites from the appalling economic disaster of the Civil War.

It was generally assumed that Negro schools and educational systems are inferior to those of the Whites and integration will cure that. But, in the Metabagdad in which I live, the Negro teachers get a higher average pay than the Whites because they have more degrees. The Negro school buildings are newer and more modern than the White school buildings on the average. And the quality of discipline in the Negro schools is generally superior to that of the Whites.

There are other areas where similar comparisons might be made in our Metabagdad where 44% of all Negro families own their homes, 75% own one or more automobiles and nearly 100% live in homes equipped with full bath facilities (not in the urban home where I was a boy), radios, television sets and other similar luxuries of yesteryear, now regarded as necessities.

Perhaps the basic reason for the pressure for integration was implied in a pathetic little speech made by a Negro member of our conference. I did not get his name, but I seem to remember that he was addressed with the title "Doctor". He said that he often felt that many Southern Whites wished that somehow all Negroes could be delivered to outer space and thus be disposed of. I thought of what a loss my daughter-in-law and my grandchildren would suffer if Mary Smith were dealt with thus. At the age of five my daughter-in-law lost her mother. Mary, a nearly illiterate Negro servant in a family of modest means, became the foster mother of the family of three. She reared them, wept and rejoiced with them, guided and disciplined them, until all are grown. My grandchildren call her "Granny Mary". And I thought about other similar Negroes and pondered my loss at their passing.

Then I remembered that people like Mary Smith are not integrationists and don't want any part of it. They are the "Uncle Toms". The pressure toward integration comes from educated and affluent Negroes, the chief beneficiaries of many millions of dollars and man hours spent during the last fifty years by the Whites of a bankrupt South to help Negroes to help themselves.

There came to mind some ugly aspects of the struggle. The Bishop of Atlanta is a kindly, gentle, stubborn, Christian man, crippled from childhood by polio. We elected him Suffragan Bishop of Alabama and hated to lose him when he was elected Diocesan Bishop of Atlanta. I have admired him as my friend since 1938. The bitter attack received from the Reverend Mr.

Morris of ESCRU astounded me. The Bishop did not bend to the demand of Mr. Morris. The Bishop must be destroyed.

Then there are the trustees of the Lovett School in Atlanta. I am in no position to judge the merit (or lack of it) of their decision not to admit the King child. Mr. Morris does not approve, so the pickets will march until either the school is destroyed or its trustees bend to his will.

There is an immigrant Russian Jew in Atlanta trying to run a restaurant. He knows that his customers will decide his fate; not ESCRU, CORE or any other group. He offered to serve only Whites. He, too, must bend or be destroyed. The "peaceful" demonstration at his restaurant involves pickets massed so densely as to be an effective barrier to the approach of any customer. The forced integration practiced in some cities is creating racial hatreds which never existed before. A racial boycott produces a racial counter-boycott.

All of this is being partially financed with money raised by the urgent solicitation of our Presiding Bishop and our Department of Christian Social Relations. We are alienating from the Church a substantial segment of its members. They are not converted to the new doctrines; only driven away.

There were other ugly results of "peaceful" demonstrations by both Whites and Negroes in my beautiful City of Birmingham: the dynamite, and senseless attacks by Negroes upon White individuals, and by Whites upon Negro individuals. These are new phenomena in our area.

And there is the destruction of Miles College as an effective unit in Negro education. Promoted by Whites largely at their expense, Miles became an accredited college training Negro teachers and leaders. After the 1954 school decision, colleges in other regions, finding a sudden urge for Negro teachers, employed every Negro Ph.D. on Miles' faculty at salaries which Miles could not pay. The White Ph.D.'s then left the faculty. Miles lost its accreditation.

There are many swirls and eddies with economic and social implications, but, basically, the integration movement is neither educational, religious nor economic; it is a desire by Negroes for status and acceptance by Whites. Mary Smith has her "White folks" who accept her and love her. (She first loved them.) She is happy, although low on the economic scale. The Negro integrationists are unhappy with their relatively high degree of education and affluence. They are not satisfied to hear an opera; they must sit with White folks while they listen. They are not satisfied with a $30,000.00 home unless it is next door to that of a White man. They may never want to enter a restaurant with Whites, but they demand the right to do so. I do not understand the problem very clearly. I doubt if any one else does, not even the most rabid integrationist or segregationist. I don't think that it is generally necessary to salvation for a Negro to approach the throne of Grace holding a White man by the hand. Neither do I understand why a man has the right, if he chooses, to turn his back upon God, and is denied the same right toward his fellow man. It is all very complex and confusing.

Only one thing is clear: The problem will never be solved by violence, either legal or illegal. It can be solved only by the power of the Holy Ghost operating through Christian people exercising their ministry of reconciliation. But we did not mention that in Atlanta. We decided to integrate, and may the devil take those who object.

The Metabagdads of the future are certain to be larger and more specialized in function, more dependent upon each other than they are today. A foraging economy supported perhaps 1,000,000 Indians. An agrarian economy required railroads, river boats and other machinery to support 50,000,000 people. When we reached 100,000,000 the formation of Metabagdads was well under way. When we reach 400,000,000 ours will be a complex society indeed. Each of us will be totally dependent upon many others; all will be at the mercy of our collective honesty and behaviour. Tensions will increase as population becomes denser. New problems will arise. There will be tension between Metabagdads over the use of available water, both above and underground. Detergents must be changed to preserve the rivers for use and re-use farther down stream. Inflation, constantly changing the dollar as a unit of value, will create its special human problems. Many other areas of tension will arise.

What will be the role of the Church? As an institution, will it decide who shall use the water and how they shall pass it on for others to use? Will it prescribe the kind of detergents with which to wash the clothes? Will it plan the housing; the kind, source, and distribution of the available food supply? Will it plan and prescribe in the name of God the political, economic, and social structure of the nation, or its educational system, or the value of the dollar (prices)? In short, will it determine every detail of community life, insisting that the "power structure" of the nation shall do its bidding? If so, by what means shall it act? Will we establish a central power authority within the Church to prescribe its actions? Can a General Convention meeting ten days each three years accomplish as much as a Congress meeting ten months each year?

Or, will we recognize the Church, not as an institution, but as a body of Christians fully capable of collectively making Christian decisions as each applies the tiny fragment of Truth which he understands to the problems which confront him in his daily tasks? Will the Church decide as an institution? Or will the Church as a body of Christian people make the decisions? These are the questions.

I don't know how theology will answer them, but I have read about a church conference concerning a similar subject held in Ephesus some 1900 years ago. St. Paul spoke of testifying to Jews and Gentiles of repentance and faith. He ended by quoting Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." St. Paul was planning an assault upon the Metabagdads of his day. The Metabagdad which we considered needs to understand that statement clearly. The solutions to its problems lie in learning to give; not in scheming to receive. Isn't it strange that I hear this fact proclaimed more often in the secular world than in the institutional Church?

I seem to remember that God, through Jesus Christ, gave us, His people, a ministry of reconciliation, reconciling us to Himself and to one another; that we are ambassadors for Christ, God making his appeal through us. There are several great passages about noisy gongs, clanging cymbals and love. I do not remember any reference to a "power structure", except the power of the Holy Ghost. I have read how a letter written by St. Paul was carried by one Onesimus back to bondage to his master, Philemon. It contained no plea for release from slavery nor for a change of station in life; just a reminder that Christians, in whatever station, may work together usefully. And there is the plea of St. Paul to Titus for gentle, law abiding behaviour, even unto submission to slavery. Is it possible that we have turned to the "power structure" of political and economic life because we have lost faith in the power of the Holy Ghost to transform the lives of men; indeed, of whole communities of men, our Metabagdads? Can it be that the Church has become an institution which has lost its power to redeem and needs anew itself to be redeemed?

One of the most moving and disturbing addresses which we heard came from the lips of our luncheon speaker on Wednesday in which he told why "as I grow older, I find myself increasingly attracted to the Person of Jesus Christ and less and less attracted to that institution which calls itself His Church".

Dear Mr. Watters:

Yesterday the stenotypist's ipsissimae verbae of Atlanta appeared on my desk. After the dazzling effect from so much pooled briliance began to wear off, a still small voice reminded me that I had not yet properly thanked you for being a consultant. Thank you very much for your hard work AND your light touch!

The general consensus seems to be that we did get off dead center... how far, time will tell. About 60% of the PMR's are in plus a great many carefully written letters. Thank you for your good words in this connexion. Personally, among many other things, I learned a lot about how not to structure plenary sessions! Omaha will be better in this respect.

Do you know about the National Educational Television program on urbanism? It is a multi-media effort combining a series of eight TV programs along with a viewer's guide, leader's manual, utilization manual, book of readings, etc. The program is entitled "Metropolis - Creator or Destroyer" and is beginning either in March, April or May over most of the NET affiliates (see listing on inside of back cover of Viewer's Guide). In New York the series began last week as in Nashville (WDCN); in Chapel Hill it begins April 8 (WUNC) and in Atlanta on May 19 (WXGA). Further information on the component parts of the program is inside the front cover of the Viewer's Guide...it might be a useful means of getting discussion going in your own city/parish.

As you can see, my deep empathy with "urban sprawl" compels me to push more stuff at you EVEN with the conference over!

Again, many thanks.

Sincerely yours,

Jim Morton

-- 8 half-hour television films, METROPOLIS: Creator or Destroyer -- Utilization Manual -- Viewer's Guide -- Promotional Brochure	available from: National Educational Television 10 Columbus Circle New York 19, N. Y.
-- Book of selected readings, METROPOLIS: Values in Conflict -- Instructor and Discussion Leader's Manual	available from: Wadsworth Publishing Co. Belmont, California

The Viewer's Guide is designed to assist in the systematic consideration of issues raised in the television films, through a brief synopsis and suggested questions for discussion and reflection. Further, it refers the viewer of each film to the corresponding sections of the book of readings. The readings do not duplicate the films, but treat and elaborate aspects of the same problem -- urbanization.

Educational institutions and many religious and civic organizations in the United States and Canada are cooperating with the University Council and with N.E.T. and its affiliated stations in presenting this program. Inquiries should be addressed to these local sponsoring organizations wherever possible. Otherwise they may be sent to:

I. HOW TO LOOK AT A CITY

"Fame...fortune...love...adventure... excitement...culture...fun... Whatever you want, the big city's got it.
'Come and get it!' the city shouts.
And by the millions, we come and we get."

The opening telecast of the series introduces us through the human drama of three newcomers to some of the major attractions of the Big City -- fame, fortune, and adventure. Against a background of New York City's tenement houses, bustling sidewalks, high-rise apartments, specialty shops, skyscrapers, and theaters, the film asks whether in this kaleidoscopic setting there is still opportunity for such essential human needs as sympathy, friendship, and even love. These two often conflicting and competing needs -- the material possibilities and opportunities of the city and the need for meaningful personal contact -- form a basic part of the problem of metropolitan living today.

The two needs have been echoed by many thinkers concerned with urban society. Professor Eugene Raskin, in the film, is an optimist, who feels the city will now, as it always has, satisfy both kinds of needs. Other writers are less sanguine. Morton and Lucia White, in the Readings, note that it is only in recent years that intellectuals have even begun to believe that positive human qualities can be found in city living. Lewis Mumford, also in the Readings, is quite pessimistic about the ability of the city today to restore the "maternal, life-nurturing functions, the autonomous activities, the symbiotic associations that have long been neglected or suppressed."

There is general agreement, however, that if we are to make possible the "symbiotic associations," it will have to be done with an eye toward maintaining or reintroducing the three interrelated elements of city life outlined by Professor Raskin -- density, variety, and human scale. We shall need density of population great enough to provide variety of opportunities and choices in friendships, services, relationships -- but not so great as to crowd us in on ourselves; variety of experiences so that the smells, sights, and sounds of the city's carnival is a never ending delight; and human scale, so that we are firmly enough rooted in our own neighborhood that the sheer size of buildings, the rapidity of change, and the numbers of people do not engulf and frighten us from human contact.

All writers are also agreed that there are no easy solutions. Each generation will have a new opportunity to interpret "meaningful city living" through the institutions, buildings, and communities it creates or destroys.

Questions for Discussion

1. Do the problems faced by people living in New York City seem to be of the same order as those of your own city? Do people in cities the size of Atlanta, Buffalo, Lincoln, or Seattle face the same dilemmas as those in New York, Chicago, or Los Angeles? What are the differences or similarities?

2. In order to help achieve "human scale" in the city, the telecast emphasizes the need for people to have neighborhood roots. To what extent can the neighborhood concept be encouraged in the large city? In what ways are you a part of your neighborhood? What neighborhood institutions in the city exist to encourage participation?

3. Would the strict enforcement of municipal occupancy regulations help in maintaining proper density of population? What would you do with the "surplus" people who would have to move out?

4. What can or should be done about preserving historically and architecturally significant buildings if they are owned by private investors concerned with making a profit?

5. Do you agree with city planners and officials who discourage the use of a single building for residential, commercial, and industrial purposes? Why? Do you feel the same about having a variety of single purpose buildings on the same block? How do you feel about "single-use" districts like Lincoln Center or Municipal Districts? Does "variety" have to exist in every building or even on every block? Is it enough that the city as a whole provides "variety?"

6. The film does not show anyone moving out of the city. What values do those who leave the city look for?

II. THE RUN FROM RACE

> "Despite all the efforts of those of goodwill, a larger percentage of our Negro population lives in segregated areas than ever before. Whites continue to resist, then to run. What of the future?

The bitterness and frustration experienced by persons who find themselves displaced and dislocated from their homes in the wake of urban renewal programs and plans in which they have had no opportunity to participate, poses one of the most serious human problems faced by our cities. For Negroes, especially, the problem is most difficult. Prevented from leaving central city, first, by reason of poverty, and second, by discriminatory housing practices in the suburbs, the Negro left behind finds his schools deteriorating, police protection lax, recreation facilities few, and municipal housing regulations inadequately enforced.

Two competing values are set against each other: the first, the desire of civic leaders to upgrade an area important to the economic, social, and cultural life of the community; the second, the need to provide for the impoverished displaced persons, usually Negroes, who are ill equipped to deal with problems of relocation.

It is in the context of these competing values that we can understand the Negro demonstration of protest which opens the second film of the series. While the specific situation in the film deals with a Philadelphia area undergoing urban renewal, the use of the mass demonstration to protest urban renewal programs has become endemic throughout the country. The situation has become altogether too familiar:

White middle class families first resist Negroes moving into their area, and then, failing to stem the newcomers, they leave, some in panic induced by unscrupulous realtors. Their reasons for leaving are many: fear of Negroes; improved economic status that permits them to move to the suburbs; a desire for a prestige suburban address; their desire to live near people of similar social, economic, and cultural interests; their fear of loss of property values; and the fear that Negroes bring with them crime and delinquency. That these fears are being expressed against Negroes is not new: they always have been expressed by majority groups everywhere when new minorities (immigrants) have come to an area. What is new, however, is that unlike other minorities, the Negro sees no way out of his dilemma.

For the person who remains in central city, there are special problems. The older and established leadership (Negro and white) is often gone. New leadership must be found, or the process of decay will immediately begin. That such leadership frequently emerges from the most unexpected places is a testament to the potential that exists in each individual. Through self-help programs, neighborhood blight often is arrested and frequently standard and property upgraded. The basic ingredient for any upgrading program, however, remains the need for peoples to maintain their active interest and concern with the welfare of their community.

Suggested readings in METROPOLIS -- Values in Conflict -- pages 205-234.

Questions for Discussion

1. Of the many reasons given why whites leave an area into which Negroes are moving, which do you feel are most important? What experience, if any, do you have with a community trying to maintain a mixed racial pattern? What was the result?

2. What suggestions do you have for making transition neighborhoods more attractive to middle class whites? Better schools? Stricter enforcement of sanitation and police regulations? What else?

3. Should there be any governmental redevelopment or renewal programs without specific concern for what is to happen to the persons who are to be displaced? Should the concern of present residents be the sole or even primary consideration in moving toward renewal or redevelopment of an area? In what ways can persons in an area be brought into Urban Renewal Planning? Can we ever expect these people to agree to have their homes planned out of existence? What alternatives exist?

4. Can the problem of relocating persons displaced by Urban Renewal programs ever be resolved without a concurrent attack on discriminatory housing practices in the suburbs?

5. How useful is the "used house" program described in the film as a solution to widespread slum areas? Is it one part of the answer? How can government help in this effort? (Special loans? Tax rebates?)

III. THE FUR-LINED FOXHOLE

"I buy a house and first thing you know I gotta buy a whole damn town."

The joys and frustrations of living in a burgeoning new suburb is the subject of the third telecast of the series. The suburbs -- made possible by the automobile, expanded income, and the encouragement of Veterans Housing and FHA loans -- offer millions a style of living more appropriate to their values and expectations than does central city. Many find, however, that these suburban values have hidden costs.

People move to the suburbs for a wide variety of reasons: to escape the dirt and noise (and minority groups) of the city; to have a house they can call their own -- with a backyard where the children can play without the danger of central city's traffic; to enjoy the reputed quality of suburban schools; for a place to park the car; for an opportunity to enjoy grass and trees and open space; for a prestige address; to shop in ease; and more. All are values not readily attainable in central city.

Many of the new suburbanites discover, however, than lawns, trees, and greenery do not just happen; they are the end result of much grubby, physical work and considerable outlays for seed, fertilizer and tools. Crab grass has its own reason for existence. Parks and playgrounds in the new suburbs have to be built, and these, too, cost money. The schools that seemed to have endless space are suddenly overcrowded, and new buildings and more teachers are needed. Storm sewers must be redesigned and installed to take care of an expanded population. Everything seems to cost more than expected -- taxes, repairs, maintenance. For some the cruelest blow comes when they experience the change from the relaxation of watching the little tots play by themselves in the backyard to the frenzied hustle of chauffering the pre-teen and teenager to school, to friends, to scouts, to dance and music lessons.

In spite of these difficulties, most suburbanites find that their new style of living remains more attractive than what it was in central city. Shopping and parking are easier, friendships seem more secure, owning a house provides a status and stability. Endless opportunities exist to participate in civic affairs, and there is the satisfaction of seeing one's name as well as those of one's friends in the local newspaper. Finally, because the size of the suburban community is well within the human scale, it is easy to identify with and take pride in community achievements -- many of which one can rightfully feel came about partly as the results of his own effort.

Suggested readings in METROPOLIS -- Values in Conflict -- pages 68 -- 88.

Questions for Discussion

1. In what ways do the problems of residents in new suburbs differ from those faced by persons who move into older and established suburban communities? Is there as much opportunity to participate and take a leadership role in the civic affairs of the older suburbs?

2. Does the suburbanite have more, about the same, or less privacy than the city resident? Does the ability to play the piano after midnight without worrying about what the neighbors will say compensate for the loss of privacy in having neighbors who feel free to drop in at any time of day? What is the impact of being so visible that your neighbors know the nature of your work, how active you are in community affairs, the way you maintain your property and grounds, the church to which you belong (and do or do not attend), the behavior of your children? Does the fact that neighbors know these things have any effect on the extent to which you conform to neighborhood patterns and standards? Is the loss of privacy (if there is a loss) compensated for by the pride in being recognized and identified as a person in your own right?

3. What happens to the cultural activities -- theater, concerts, art museums -- of residents in new suburbs? These activities are still only an automobile or train ride away, but do suburbanites take as much effort as city residents to attend them? Is this merely an expression of differences in values between city and suburban residents of the same socio-economic level? Do residents of older suburbs face the same cultural loss?

4. Are people in the suburbs more friendly than those in the city? Would help such as that proffered the sick mother in the film have been equally available in the city? Do suburbanites tend to trust each other more?

5. Is there really more opportunity to be a "pioneer" in the new suburb than in the city? Are the opportunities merely of a different order? What kinds of "pioneering" can be done in the city? Combating delinquency? Trying to find a way to upgrade an area? What else?

IV. PRIVATE DREAM, PUBLIC NIGHTMARE

> "We got the idea that land was something you sort of went in and used up and then went on...used up some more and went further. But we're at the cost now..."

The problem posed in the fourth telecast in the series arises out of the apparent inexorable growth of spread housing patterns; patterns which many planners believe will inevitably lead to a loss of those values for which the houses were built in the first instance. To compound the difficulty, we do not have, nor have we seemed able to develop, institutions to deal with the uncontrolled growth of spread housing.

The growth of spread housing and its concurrent ravishing of land stems from the private decision of millions of us to put into effect the dream of working in the city and living in the country, and traveling back and forth from job to home in the comfort of our own car. Only in recent years, is the impact of what we are doing becoming clear.

The open spaces have begun to close up. The process started first when the suburbs began to zone new residences into larger lots in order to cut rising costs of increased population and to maintain for themselves stable tax revenues. Then as we began to look for less expensive land on which to build our houses, we went farther from our jobs into the farm land beyond the suburbs where zoning ordinances were lax or non-existent, and away from the railroads and highways. At present much of the space between the natural avenues to central city is almost filled and land for new homes can be found only in a new ring in the rural areas beyond the farthest suburbs.

The phenomenon of spread housing is new. Neither city, nor suburb, nor farm, it presents a living experience never before encountered. Back yard spaciousness is retained, but open country is gone. The cohesiveness of the suburb is lost and not replaced by any sense of community. Hundreds of identical lots (often with identical houses) spread out so that no focal point exists for establishing stores, churches, recreational facilities, or even schools. Finally, because there is no sense of community, individual developers are free to ravish local resources without fear of community censure. The result is inevitable: the suburban slum -- the slurb.

The film suggests one partial solution to the problem of the growing number of slurbs: encourage large scale private developers to plan whole communities rather than leave the construction of homes to thousands of separate builders, none of whom have an over-all concern with what the community will be. By planning a whole community, sufficient variety and density can be built into the development so that all can benefit. Presumably, the large developer, concerned with the long-range investment of his project will fight blight before it has a chance to set in.

But even the largest private developer cannot cope with the total dimensions of the slurb problem. He still remains dependent on adjacent large and small developers, nearby municipalities, and state and federal agencies, all of which influence or determine the kinds of roads which will service the community, provide solutions to problems of water purity, air pollution, and so on.

At present, there are few single agencies of government that can concern themselves with planning for an entire region, and we are left with the dilemma of spread housing patterns growing all around us without the means for curbing or controlling it.

Questions for Discussion

1. How would you feel about having your local government give up some of its authority on matters of zoning, land use, taxing, etc., to a regional form of government? Do you believe most people could develop the kinds of loyalty to and interest in a regional governmental unit which they now have for the municipality in which they live? Are there any regional government agencies in the area where you now live? (Policy, fire, water, traffic, or other interstate agencies?) How effective have they been?

2. If you were a local councilman, would you encourage small lot residential construction -- with the resultant probable disproportionate increase in school, police, fire, and other municipal costs? Would you expect to be reelected?

3. What impact, if any, do you feel spread housing will have on central city and the suburbs? Can central city expect to have as much support for its cultural institutions as it gets from the traditional suburb? What will spread housing do to prevent suburban traffic problems?

4. What values besides spaciousness of the immediate grounds are available to residents of spread housing?

5. Is the large developer less subject to the pressures of the market place than the small developer? Is it possible that reversals in the real estate market may make the impact of a large developer worse than that of the small developer? Does the fact that the large developer has a plan make a difference?

6. What other suggestions do you have for dealing with the problems of spread housing?

V. HOW THINGS GET DONE

> "We might as well face the fact that in urban renewal as in any other creative endeavor you can't please everyone... someone may be helped by the completion of the plan...someone may be ruined."

Two concurrent themes run through the telecast of the fifth session. The first deals with the unhappy choice which city officials and planners have to make when faced with alternative and conflicting proposals for urban redevelopment and land use. The second theme has to do with the ability of a single dedicated person to put forces into motion which can change the face of a community.

Each city has many needs, all of them urgent. There is the need for adequate housing to take care of low, middle, and upper income groups. There is the need for different kinds of commercial places to care for the varied consumer interests of the city -- from buying the morning newspaper to purchasing a sable coat or a share of stock. There is the need for industrial space to take care of the heterogeneous firms which need a city location. Considered separately, there is complete agreement that each kind of space is needed in greater quantity. The difficulty arises, however, when a choice must be made as to which use should be assigned to a single, specific area.

Over the years, land use in the city changes to meet changing needs. Within one generation fine residential areas turn into rooming house or industrial neighborhoods; industrial and commercial buildings give way to middle or high income apartment houses. When ample space was available, no problem of choice existed: the land went to the highest bidder. Now that space is limited, however, the social as well as financial cost must be considered in making final decisions. We have recognized that the way our cities develop is too important to leave to the money market alone.

The simple answer to problems of land use is -- plan! But plan for what! We cannot plan unless we have aims and objectives; goals which we seek for the city. Only as we approach consensus on how our total community design should look, can community planning be meaningful. The first task in planning is the setting of objectives.

Each special interest group has a plan, something which reflects its objectives, but leaves out of account the objectives of others. The industrial commission trying to attract industry, the chamber of commerce trying to maintain commercial space and hold down taxes, the housing committee concerned with more and better housing, labor unions looking out for the jobs of its members, the tax commission interested in maintaining or increasing taxable property, the fine arts commission trying to preserve historically and architecturally significant buildings, the artists looking for cheap loft space, and so on. Finally, of course, there is the City Wide Planning Commission, whose responsibility is to concern itself with what is best for the total city. But this group, too, can act only in response to the varying pressures upon it.

No decision for the use of scarce space can favor everyone, or even most of the persons or interests involved. Obviously, there is no ready answer. Yet answers must be found, for to do nothing is in itself a form of answer. Nor can we always depend on "objective surveys," for the basic data is frequently in doubt, and the number of variables in most situations too great. All too often the final results of the research reflect the biases of those sponsoring the studies.

While the film uses a rather rundown industrial area of New York to illustrate the complexity of an urban redevelopment issue, the problem is applicable whenever we have to consider alternative uses for land. For the generation which tears down or builds up a whole area must live with its decision; there is no immediate second choice of what to do with a building already torn down and a new one in its place.

Questions for Discussion

1. What solution do you suggest for the South Houston Street project? What values must you be prepared to forego in the light of your solution? To what extent does your solution reflect your objectives for the city?

2. In any redevelopment program, should we be guided solely by what is good for the present users of the property? Can there ever be consensus in any redevelopment program? What kinds? Should redevelopment solutions be subject to a plebiscite? Who should be permitted to vote?

3. Recognizing the complexities of any decision regarding the best uses of scarce land, who would you want to make the final decisions? The City Wide Planning Commission? How would you go about supporting its decisions?

4. In the light of constantly changing needs, can or should there be a single plan, rigidly adhered to, for the total community? What factors, if any, should determine changes in the plan? Would piecemeal planning be more successful?

5. To what extent are people in your community interested in planning for the total community? Are there citizen as well as official groups interested in planning for the total community? Can you identify individuals or groups whose concern with planning reflects their vested interests? Are both kinds of persons and groups desirable and/or necessary?

VI. WHAT WILL THEY TEAR DOWN NEXT

"All cities need a touch of past grandeur."

"There is apathy in our cities, and capital is being made of it."

In "The City in History," Lewis Mumford points out: "By means of its storage facilities (buildings, vaults, archives, monuments, tablets, books), the city has become capable of transmitting a complex culture from generation to generation... That remains the greatest of the city's gifts." This ability of cities to pass on, in part through its buildings, the culture of one era to another is being destroyed today by the widespread practice of leveling whole areas. It is in protest of this process, and with the apathy which makes the process possible, that the sixth telecast addresses itself.

The nature of cities is to change. But the rate of change in a modern city has no peace time parallel in the past. The wrecking ball and bulldozer too frequently become the only weapons we employ in the war on urban decay. While conducting the battles, however, we are destroying much that is good along with the bad.

Fortunately, there seems to be some indication that the younger architects have become concerned not only with the single buildings which they are helping to create, but with how these buildings fit into the general surroundings. Also, architects have taken the lead in protesting wanton destruction of historical and architecturally significant buildings. This development needs encouragement, but it can come about only by an interested public -- a public concerned with holding on to the worthwhile building, even finding new uses for it, and creating new buildings for those which no longer serve a useful function. Much that should be torn down, and much that should be retained can be determined only by taste and good judgement, but these are qualities that can be acquired. Much of this taste comes about by recognizing that part of the charm of the city is the juxtaposition of the new with the old, to the benefit of both. The old provides a stability which makes the new more welcome and enjoyable.

Can the public apathy which permits the destruction of the good with the bad be overcome? It is relatively easy to demonstrate on picket lines and write editorials on the day that the wrecking ball actually begins to destroy a significant building, but by then it is too late to picket. That building is already gone. Blight begins with little things, for as the film indicates, successive exemptions can destroy the morale of a city, for each exemption makes the next and larger exemption easier to obtain, and the entire neighborhood can be victimized.

Thus, the fight to overcome apathy must begin in the neighborhood. Successful action against permitting the first building to go into disrepair in violation of city ordinances; against the housing agency when it does not act promptly on complaints; against the first exemption made in residential zoning -- each acts as a stimulus to greater citizen concern and participation. Finally, with experience and insight, citizens can make their protests effective when remodelers or builders start the process of community decay when they use bad design or inappropriate materials.

Slums, being man-made, can be man-prevented. Numerous examples can be cited of residential areas where progress toward deterioration was checked and the areas rehabilitated and upgraded. In each instance where such a reversal took place, the key was an aroused public, concerned and interested in the future of its neighborhood.

Questions for Discussion

1. What can individuals do if the owner of a house will not cooperate in making needed repairs? Should a government agency be given authority to compel repairs for aesthetic as well as safety reasons?

2. To what extent have you ever become involved in protesting an exemption in residential zoning? Do your municipal officials welcome questions on exemptions which are being considered? What recommendations would you have for public notice of proposed exemptions?

3. Do you believe that a fine arts commission, with authority to determine appropriate building design, would be an asset to your community? What limitations, if any, would you want to put on its authority? What kinds of persons should be the members of the commission? What would be the function of the interested layman?

4. To whom should the architect be responsible -- his profession, his clients, the community? To what extent are the architects of your community, acting as individuals or through their professional associations, concerned with the over-all design of the city? Is the physical design of our cities too important to be left in the control of any single group, even such professional groups as architects or city planners?

VII. HOW TO LIVE IN A CITY

> "Streets and sidewalks are perhaps the most important kind of open space we have in a city....and the least respected by our city governments."

How and whether our modern cities can create opportunities for the charm and aesthetic delights offered by urban open space is the problem posed in the seventh telecast of the series. These delights, so frequently found in European cities when we suddenly come upon former market places, forums, and plazas, offer one of the best ways in which we can experience variety and human scale in city life. Such open space utilizes the primary resources of the city, its people and buildings, to provide a constant excitement and sense of anticipation. As humans, we find that watching the flow of people, their faces, their actions, their behavior, offers one of the most attractive pastimes. Second only to this is to be in the midst of an ever unfolding change in city scenery.

Urban open spaces should not be confused with large parks, like New York City's Central Park, whose primary function the telecast indicates is not to bring people more deeply into the city, but to allow them to escape city life. Rather, city open space will normally not have any lawns or greenery (which are usually distinguished by their "keep off" signs), but will have places to rest, places which welcome the visitor to sit down and watch the passing scene. Excellent examples of open spaces which encourage people to see people, all in the foreground of a never ending change of scene are places like Times Square, the 59th Street Plaza, and Rockefeller Center. (As the film says, if grass and lawn are the values which people cherish, they ought to live in the suburbs).

Open space in the city can be most effective if:
(a) it relates to the buildings around it, so that persons in the buildings can enjoy what goes on below (as well as in the buildings facing it), while people on the ground can enjoy the various buildings surrounding them; (b) it is enclosed by the buildings around it in a definable shape, so that the eye stays within the space itself; (c) it has a center of interest such as a fountain or statue which provides a focal point where people can gather and a point of interest to which the eye can return; and (d) it must have a character "able to provide for love" and capable of developing its own personality which it can stamp on the community that surrounds it."

There are a variety of ways in which city open space can be developed even within our typical city gridiron pattern. First, by commercial and industrial users like the Seagram Company who recognize the need for variety and human scale outside their buildings as well as within. By semi-public institutions, like colleges, which build into their development plans areas like the Columbia University quadrangle. Finally, open space created by the cooperative efforts of individual home owners who remove obstacles like backyard fences which prevent viewing variety and permanently encloses each house in itself.

Most of all, however, open space in the city will depend upon builders being made aware of the need to design their buildings so that the view looking out of windows is of as much interest as the layout of the inside rooms; and of a public conscious of the need to preserve its streets, its sidewalks, and its stoops as among the richest sources it has for maintaining and creating human scale and variety in the city.

Questions for Discussion

1. Would the group agree with a major thesis of the telecast that large open areas, like Central Park, are merely the residue of our pre-automobile ara? Do you feel that these large parks provide an essential need for city people? Does the large park still provide an escape for those without automobiles?

2. Is a primary attraction of city open space (as defined in the film) seeing many other people? Is there a need for places in the city where people can get away from other people? Is it possible that twice the number of people would go to crowded Washington Square if it were only half filled? Does this indicate the need for more Washington Squares rather than more people in single small open spaces?

3. The telecast indicates that only we can supply the love of city open spaces -- but can the planners help? How?

4. How can builders and architects be encouraged to make open space a part of their designs? Should municipal codes set standards for open space in new construction?

VIII. THREE CURES FOR A SICK CITY

"Improvement can be just as infectious as blight."

A variety of methods have been tried to deal with problems of urban renewal and modernization. As we have seen in previous sessions, there are no perfect solutions which will satisfy everyone. The needs of current users must be balanced against the total needs of the community and the special needs of particular groups. In the final telecast of the series, three different approaches to the problem of urban renewal and modernization which were tried in Washington, D.C., are considered. Each solution raises a number of questions, but each is marked as the product of a neighborhood that knew what were its objectives.

The first approach was in the Georgetown area, where individual initiative, with a minimum of government assistance, turned what was fast becoming a slum district into one of the most fashionable sections of the Capitol. First one person, then another, began to modernize, remodel, or renew some of the old and historic homes in the area. A municipal ordinance was passed giving a Fine Arts Commission some power to see that restorations and renovations of both homes and shops preserved the style and the feel of the atmosphere. Within a period of 20 years, Georgetown, while it still has a great variety of houses and incomes, has changed from fast becoming a slum area to an upper income district of great attraction. As the film indicates, houses which in some parts of Washington would sell for $20,000, now sell for $60,000 in Georgetown.

The improvement in Georgetown is cited as proof that government aided slum clearance is not needed. But the Georgetown experience raises a serious question for persons concerned with total community planning. In an area which in the 1940's had a population of some 12,000 Negroes, fewer than 400 now remain. Obviously, the Georgetown district was upgraded not for the residents who lived there, but for new residents. Presumably, many who left now constitute the population of other slums in Washington.

Government assistance played a major role in the second approach to the problem of urban development in Washington. In this instance, an area of about 25,000 people was entirely razed. The reasons for leveling the buildings seem clear: as late as 1955, one-fourth of the houses still used backyard privies; most of the other houses were in disrepair; the district was the center for the city's failures, its cripples, and its outcasts.

On the cleared grounds, private developers erected middle income high-rise apartments. Rents started at $110 per month for ground floor efficiency apartments of one room. There is no low income housing. For those who live in these apartments there is ample room, and the panorama of Washington is constantly in front of them. In many ways it provides ideal living accommodations, but 90 percent of the former residents can no longer afford to live there.

The third approach for dealing with urban development in Washington combines both governmental and private resources, and most important, involves all those who will be affected by the change. The area contains a wide variety of racial and nationality groups, apartments, private homes, rooming houses, commercial establishments, and industries. Discussion among all residents resulted in a plan which calls for improvements by private home owners, areas set aside for high-rise middle-income apartments, sections to be cleared for parks and play space, and scattered units of public housing. If the entire program were completed, about a quarter of the residents and about half of the businesses would have to leave the area.

At the moment, the plan is still opposed by a variety of special interest groups: light industries which do not want to be forced out of the area; and private developers who want to make the area a new Georgetown. There is agreement that the plan, or any plan which follows, will be a compromise which will satisfy many, but not all those involved in the planning.

Questions for Discussion

1. Which of the three approaches to urban renewal did you favor most? Which plan did you like least? Can there be any single best plan for urban renewal?

2. Is it inevitable that some people will be hurt by any plan for urban renewal? What obligations, if any, are owed to those who are hurt? Who should share these obligations -- the new users? the various branches of government?

3. Is it realistic to expect to involve all people in an area to work on a plan for urban renewal which will inevitably hurt some of them?

The Summer Before Us

EDITORIAL COMMENT

A Time for Reason

Everybody predicts a long, hot summer and few fail to escape the meaning of the prediction. Even with the passage of the Civil Rights Bill, racial tensions may create ugly scenes of violence and tragedy.

Even for those close to the civil rights battle, the present time is confusing. Here are a few of the questions that point to the complexity of the moment. How can a militant Negro leader retain his leadership without bending in part to the irresponsible demands of a still-more-militant following? How will passage of the Civil Rights Bill meet the desperate situation of millions of Americans who are so poor that they can scarcely take advantage of the rights the Bill offers? Will bitterness over continued unemployment and poverty coalesce with racial frustration to create a movement more desperate and militant than any we have yet known? How is the Civil Rights Bill to be implemented in states like Mississippi and Alabama without Federal intervention? To what extent will the movement of an estimated thousand college students from the North into Mississippi this summer inflame the violence of local rednecks? How will next fall's political picture be altered if this summer is truly a time of battle?

Under the weight of such questions, fear and hesitation emerge in those who are friendly to the cause of civil rights. In our nervousness, we seize upon seemingly irresponsible Negro acts as a pretext for avoiding the basic issues. We react by accepting a number of half-truths and using them as an excuse for silence. Let us examine some of the half-truths:

- Opponents of integration, like Alabama's George Wallace, gain ground in the North by painting the Civil Rights Legislation as an extension of the police power of the "central" government. This is a very clever tactic because we may fear big government and police power. But is this the nature of the Bill? In order to allow readers to reach their own conclusion, we have printed a Civil Rights Bill digest on page four.

- Another pretext for evading the clear issue of racial justice is to seize upon extreme instances of Negro militancy as an argument for "moving more slowly" on civil rights. This is a specious argument for one simple reason. It has been the failure of moderate Negro and white leadership to gain the full measure of racial justice that has spawned the extremists. And there can be no underestimating the danger to the nation should this pattern continue. It takes only a few desperate persons to wreak havoc. Frustrated militants number in the thousands and their potential followers number in the hundreds of thousands. Every responsible advance in civil rights minimizes the chance of extremism and violent retaliation. The vast majority of the Negro community is willing to forgive white America for its sins of the past and accept full citizenship with a sense of responsibility and dedication. If this majority is thwarted in its legitimate demand, then we have only ourselves to blame. We will have helped spawn the extremists.

- A final argument used by rights opponents is that the white community's rights will be violated in the event the Bill is passed. But this is to suggest that the Negro should not have the same rights as whites. Such a position must be seen for what it is: a reversion to the segregationist posture. For precisely what Governor Wallace argues is the notion that whites have a right to live, work, and play in isolation from the Negro. To accept this is to deny not only the law and the Constitution but the total understanding of America as the home of the free.

Let us make some final observations:

First, it may be a violent summer. But we must decide to act on the principle that white resistance to legitimate demands—even in the face of violence—merely inflames the situation.

Secondly, our first reaction to potential violence may be one of fear. Fear breeds violent reaction and violent reaction breeds a whiplash of mob violence. This has been demonstrated already in several racial incidents. It is time for the white community to consider the implications of nonviolence both as a tactic and an ideal in the rights struggle.

Thirdly, no persons are more aware of the handicaps facing the Negro community than the Negro community. Whites observe from the outside the results of deprivation in education, employment, and housing. The Negro lives with it. The responsible white community must begin to understand that the movement for justice must gain on all fronts—in employment offices, in inner city crash programs of education, and in the elimination of substandard housing through creative policies of urban renewal.

Finally, we hope that the current struggle will be seen as a nonpartisan effort. The disposition of the problems of race and poverty is no less a matter of national security than is the conduct of the cold war. To use poverty and race as partisan issues is to heap coals on a fire that threatens the moral fabric of American life. We can see the complexity of the issues before us. But let us not be deterred. Let us raise our voices in a chorus of reason so that the summer which seems like a potential shambles may become a great step forward. And let us not allow violence and bitterness to blind us in finding our goal.

RENEWAL is published monthly September through June by the Exploratory Program in Journalism of the Chicago City Missionary Society, an organization sponsoring more than twenty programs devoted to the renewal of the Church in the metropolis, Don Benedict, General Director. RENEWAL office: 19 So. La Salle St., Room 1302, Chicago, Illinois 60603. RENEWAL is supported by voluntary contributions. Suggested contributions: Individual mailings—$2.00. Bulk rates—10¢ per copy.

This Month's Cover

No better symbolism could be found to represent the role of the Church in race relations than this photograph of the stained glass window of Birmingham's Sixteenth Street Baptist Church after the 1963 bombing which took the lives of four innocent children. It reminds us that the ultimate tragedy of racial intolerance is that it deforms the body of Christ and divides His Church. We hope the article about Will Campbell in this issue will aid in pointing out the relation of the Church to the crisis in civil rights.

Publishing Note

We wish to thank readers who are responding so generously to our annual appeal for funds to operate RENEWAL. We hope every reader who receives the publication will contribute at least the two dollars it costs to print and mail individual issues through the year.

We are bursting with material we'd like to publish and ideas to communicate, not to mention photographs we wish to print. But it is a sad reality that our finances will not permit us to pursue these goals to the fullest. In fact, we have had to make the hard decision to combine our April and May issues in order to offset some of the costs of our double-length, double-circulation February issue. We hope readers will understand. If adequate contributions are received in future months, we intend to remedy this omission before the year is completed.

Where The Money Goes

Overheard on a train: "The only thing you hear when you go to church is money, money, money. Is that all the church has to say?" Indeed, the renewal of the church will depend on a drastic re-evaluation of the church's financial posture. The growing complaint of many laymen is that too much money goes for needless frills—such as fancy buildings—and that not enough funds are put into imaginative programming.

During 1961, the latest year for which information is available, thirty-nine Protestant and Eastern Orthodox denominations received contributions totalling just over two and a half billion dollars. But only 18 per cent of this was designated for "benevolences"—a term that includes home and foreign missions as well as overseas relief work. The rest of the money went for local expenses of individual congregations.

These local expenses, mostly ministers' salaries, maintenance costs and investments in church buildings, averaged about $54 per member. The average contribution for benevolences was just over $12. A conservative estimate is that the cost of raising and administering benevolence money is 25 per cent of the total. Thus giving for direct service beyond the local congregation averages less than $10 per year per member, barely one-sixth of one's average annual contribution to the church.

The basic question is why we need to spend more than fifty dollars a year to maintain the institution so that ten dollars might be freed for service. There can be no doubt that imaginative programs are carried out as part of the local congregation's non-benevolence expenses. But, for the most part, benevolence contributions are understood to be the "service" share of the church's money. And most congregations have the interesting practice of making benevolences an afterthought. In other words, they regard their local, institutional expenses as the top priority, giving what is left over for benevolences.

Usually when churches talk of financial sacrifice and Christian giving it is in reference to the construction of church buildings, not to serving the world's poor and needy.

Recently a large denomination conducted a study to determine whether it could sponsor a nationwide capital funds campaign. The interesting conclusion was that many laymen had little idea of what the money was for or what it might accomplish. The recommendation was to go on with the campaign but reduce the initial financial goal by more than two-thirds.

This raises the question of the extent that church money should be sunk into capital expenses, such as the construction of hospitals, schools, and homes for the aged. Or should laymen seek to work to improve secular institutions?

Far more important than this, however, is the question of whether churches are justified in expending huge sums of money on buildings to house local congregations. One minister wryly observes that the basic need of a local congregation—a place to gather for worship and fellowship—can be met by providing a table with a roof over it. Expenses for large educational facilities are questionable because they are used only one or two days a week.

We hope to delve further into the complex but important question of church finances and we shall welcome reports from readers with their suggestions concerning the financial renewal of the church.

What will the summer bring? We hope it will bring justice with understanding, change without violence. This issue of RENEWAL is designed as an up-to-date interpretation of some of the most pressing problems of our time. We hope you will wish to distribute copies to friends and study groups. The Civil Rights Bill: A Digest

The following digest of the Civil Rights Bill is excerpted from an informative pamphlet titled "Some Questions and Answers on the Civil Rights Bill"—available free from Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, Room 314, 704 17th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. What follows is not an argument for or against the Bill but a concise description of its contents.

Title One: Voting Rights

To further protect voting rights in Federal elections, it would prohibit: (1) the application of different tests, standards, etc. to white and colored voters and (2) the denial of registration for immaterial errors in applications. It would require all literacy tests to be given in writing or transcribed. To expedite handling of cases filed under the 1957 and 1960 Civil Rights Acts, it would authorize the Attorney General or a defendant to ask for trial by a three-judge court, with direct appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. In any such proceeding it established a presumption of literacy for those who have completed the sixth grade.

Title Two: Public Accommodations

It would prohibit discrimination in most hotels, motels, and other places of lodging; restaurants, cafeterias and other eating places; motion picture houses, theaters, sports arenas, stadia and other places of exhibition and entertainment; gas stations; and such places as specialty shops and barber shops in hotels subject to the section and stores with eating facilities covered by the bill. An aggrieved individual or the U.S. Attorney General would be able to enforce these rights through injunctions or other civil actions. There is a specific exemption for small rooming houses with no more than five rooms to rent and used by the proprietors as their own residences.

Title Three: Public Facilities

The Attorney General would be empowered to initiate or intervene in suits aimed at desegregating public facilities other than schools—such as parks, libraries, hospitals and playgrounds—where the injured party is unable to pursue the remedy. He would also be authorized to intervene in private actions brought by persons seeking relief from a denial of equal protection of the law because of race, creed, color or national origin.

Title Four: Public Education

It authorizes the Attorney General to initiate or intervene in school desegregation cases. It provides for technical assistance, grants and training institutes to help communities prepare for school desegregation. But it exempts from its definition of desegregation, the transportation of students to end racial imbalance.

Title Five: Civil Rights Commission

It would extend the life of the Commission another four years and give it additional duties of investigating vote fraud cases and serving as a national clearing house on civil rights.

Title Six: Federally-Assisted Programs

It would prohibit discrimination in any program or activity receiving Federal assistance under grant, contract or loan. It directs Federal agencies to establish programs of compliance and would authorize denial of funds to those programs that discriminate. But any denial is subject to judicial review. A hearing is guaranteed before funds are cut off, and a report to Congress is also required before funds can be denied. Presidential approval is required before any general cut-off in funds is approved.

Title Seven: Employment

Employers, labor unions and employment agencies whose activities affect interstate commerce would be prohibited from discriminating. Coverage would include employers and unions with 25 or more employees or members. But coverage would apply at first to those with 100 or more employees or members and drop by stages to 25, after 4 years. An Equal Employment Opportunity Commission would be established to investigate and voluntarily settle complaints. Upon failure to settle, the Commission would be authorized to file suit to enforce nondiscrimination. Prohibited discrimination includes sex, as well as race, creed, color or national origin. The House excluded from coverage those denied employment because they are atheists or communists.

Title Eight: Statistics

It directs the Secretary of Commerce to conduct a voting census by race in geographic areas recommended by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. This is meant to help enforce Section 2 of the 14th Amendment which provides that where the right to vote in Federal or state elections is denied, the basis of the state's representation in the House of Representatives will be correspondingly reduced.

Title Nine: Removal Proceedings

The orders of Federal courts sending certain civil rights cases back to state courts are not now reviewable. This would make them reviewable by appeal.

Title Ten: Community Relations

It would establish in the Department of Commerce, a Community Relations Service with personnel limited to six persons to assist communities involved in disputes over desegregation. This title was added at the request of Southern members of the House.

Title Eleven: Miscellaneous

It contains a number of customary provisions. One, authorizes appropriations to carry out the purposes of the bill. Another—a "severability clause"—says that if any provision of the act is held invalid, the rest of the act shall not be affected. A fairly standard "preemption" clause, added during floor debate, specifies that nothing in the Act shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of Congress "to occupy the field in which any . . . title operates to the exclusion of State laws on the same subject. . . ."

RELIGION AND RACE

a photographic essay

In the summer of 1963, Dr. Robert Spike, Director of the National Council of Churches' Commission on Religion and Race, met Governor George Wallace of Alabama in a Baltimore TV debate. This represented one of the numerous efforts of the Commission to meet directly the opponents of integration. The Commission is now helping to train college students who will spend the summer aiding voter registration campaigns in Mississippi.

Photographs by Kenneth Thompson

Pathos and tragedy marked the aftermath of the bombing of Birmingham's Sixteenth Street Baptist Church which took four lives. Pathos and tragedy seem latent in the faces of Klan members (below). The presence of a cross on the Klan uniform suggests heretical use of Christian symbols.

In August, 1963, the Commission on Religion and Race sent a delegation (above) to Clarksdale, Miss., to attempt to mediate between white and Negro leaders. At the same time, SNICK and CORE workers in Clarksdale (below) were engaged in a seemingly impossible attempt to better the lot of Delta Negroes.

The varied faces of involvement in the struggle are shown on these pages. A small boy (left, top) seems bewildered by his early induction into the renascent Klan. Some hope is present in a small Atlanta, Georgia, girl's smile and a sign: "Love everybody." Determination and impatience seem etched on the face of James Forman, a leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (opposite page, upper left). The leader of the Civil Rights Bill Campaign in the Senate, Hubert Humphrey, (opposite, upper right) is shown at last summer's historic March on Washington, an event in which many church groups participated. The face of militant direct action is evident (opposite, lower left) in a 1963 sit-down in Chapel Hill, N.C. Responsible militancy and dogged determination have marked the life of James Bevel (opposite, lower right) who is a field secretary for Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. SCLC is currently sponsoring a film on voter registration which is being produced by RENEWAL's roving editor, Robert Newman. The faces of involvement are many. The goal is the same: full citizenship for the Negro . . . now.

CLEVELAND TRAGEDY: A SOBER WARNING

By JOHN ROBERTS

On Thursday morning, April 7, a group of Protestant ministers and rabbis met for breakfast at Church of the Covenant on Cleveland's East Side. The group had been meeting every other Tuesday morning to discuss and keep abreast of the news concerning the civil rights struggle over the schools. Toward the end of the meeting the Rev. Bruce Klunder rose to announce that there would be a demonstration at noon aimed at halting construction at one of the disputed school sites.

At one o'clock Bruce Klunder and a few others on the picket line ran onto the construction site. Some women ran in front of a bulldozer and, shouting to the driver that there was someone behind him, threw themselves in the path of the huge machine. The driver did not hear what they had shouted, and slammed the bulldozer in reverse, crushing to death the young minister who was behind it.

The demonstration had been peaceful and nonviolent, but a huge crowd had gathered to watch. Trouble had been anticipated, and there were many police at the scene. Even before the death of Bruce Klunder the observing crowd grew unruly as they watched police brutally handle nonviolent demonstrators who were committing acts of civil disobedience.

After the tragic accident, most of the demonstrators went into a church for a memorial service, and as the word spread that Bruce Klunder had been killed, the gathering mob began hurling stones and rioting. The resulting bedlam continued well into the night. Several attempts were made by Negro pastors to quell the crowd, but it got out of hand and no one could control it.

The mayor, as in the past, though he anticipated trouble, took the stand that he would wait and see what would happen at the school site that day before taking any action. He had done the same thing in February on Murray Hill where a white mob rioted all day and into the night anticipating a picket line around the Murray Hill School that never showed up. Both times violence erupted, the only difference being that not one arrest was made on Murray Hill, though property damage was extensive and several newsmen and Negroes were badly beaten. Negroes compare the way the police conducted themselves during the rioting of the white mob with the way they conducted themselves on April 7, and chalk up another illustration of "white man's justice".

The next day there was a solemn march around the School Board office, and this ended in a march to City Hall where a sit-in demonstration began. The police at the scene outnumbered the demonstrators two to one. At three o'clock the mayor, the School Board, and Civil Rights leaders finally met. At about ten o'clock in the evening a truce was announced, whereby Civil Rights groups agreed not to picket at the school sites, and school construction would stop for two weeks. The very next morning the president of the School Board (who left the meeting early) repudiated the truce. An injunction came out of the courts prohibiting any more than ten pickets at the school site, but did permit building to continue at the sites. The Civil Rights movement felt this was a betrayal of the truce, and this reinforced in their minds the belief that the leadership in the city could not be trusted.

An economic boycott is now underway directed against two downtown department stores in an attempt to get the business community to exert leadership. Also being boycotted is the Cleveland Press, whose reporting has left much to be desired.

The young minister's death brought to Cleveland many concerned about the Civil Rights cause. Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, who gave the address at a Memorial Service for Bruce Klunder, and Dr. Marshall Scott came for the funeral, as well as James Farmer and Dick Gregory of CORE.

The United Freedom Movement, made up of cooperating civil rights groups, is opposed to Cleveland's school construction program because the new schools are being built on inadequate sites to resegregate students who have been integrated into white schools (again only after months of picketing and demonstrations.) The construction does not take into account urban renewal plans, and therefore the City Planning Commission did not endorse the school program. One of the schools is being built on a street that is destined to be a six lane highway, while another is being built with no provision for a playground because of lack of space.

The School Board has refused not only to meet with Civil Rights groups on this problem, but has refused to talk with the Conference on Religion and Race made up of the top leaders of the Jewish, Catholic and Protestant communities. It is because the Board has refused to open itself to hear citizen groups, and because it is going ahead building inferior schools in the heart of the ghetto rather than on the growing edge of the community that demonstrations have taken place.

The UFM is challenging the neighborhood concept of the schools. They feel that in this century children need the kind of education no neighborhood school can provide. The need is for consolidation of resources to make sure that all children have access to good libraries, science laboratories, special teachers and teaching methods. Their hope is that the educational park system will be developed. By building a campus of elementary schools, junior high and high schools in a central area, or in several areas on the outskirts of the city, children from all parts of the city would have available to them better facilities and teaching than any one neighborhood school could provide. This would assure integrated, quality education.

A strong group of Protestant and Jewish clergymen have played an active role in this struggle, not only participating in the demonstrating, but also by trying to interpret these events to the wider community. The morning after the death of Bruce Klunder, this group formed an Emergency Committee for Civil Rights, and their executive committee set out to meet with the newspapers and the civic leaders in an effort to release some sound leadership into the crisis. The group, a week later, seeing the impasse, agreed to fast every Tuesday from sunrise to sundown as an act of repentance. It also agreed to stop whatever they are doing on that day at 1:00 PM to pray for peace and justice in our city. The money saved from not eating that day will go into a fund to put out a fact sheet on the crisis. The fast will continue until a breakthrough is made in this community.

JOHN ROBERTS will become Director of The Outpost, a ministry of laymen in Cleveland, Ohio, beginning June 1.

A Southern Churchman's Question Embarrasses the Church

WHITHER THE GOSPEL?

By STEPHEN C. ROSE

Ever since Birmingham bombings and Mississippi slayings began to convince America that the Negro might be serious in his demand for equal rights, clergymen have been saying that the response of Christians to the crisis would dictate whether or not the Church was truly relevant in our age.

As events in Birmingham and elsewhere were heralding "the racial revolution of 1963", church groups began to organize in a sort of last ditch effort to prove that they could overcome the lily-white, Anglo-Saxon image of American Protestantism. Numerous religion-and-race groups emerged after the historic Conference on Religion and Race was held in Chicago in January, 1963. Protestant denominations began to organize semi-official groups to meet the problem. And the National Council of Churches cut through the tangle of red tape that afflicts the ecclesiastical bureaucracy to create its Special Commission on Religion and Race, an agency that has done much to mobilize church action on the race issue.

Despite the fact that these moves were made a decade after the 1954 Supreme Court ruling on schools and a full century after the Civil War, the beginnings of Protestant participation in the race struggle seemed laudable.

It can even be said that the churches have "proved" themselves relevant in the struggle. Senator Paul Douglas of Illinois has said that the outcome of the Civil Rights Bill will depend on the capacity of churches to generate favorable opinion. The President has received the upper echelons of Protestant leadership. And few are the pro-civil rights politicians that fail to praise the Christian community for its concern.

If this is so, then a chorus of praise might be expected from those who contend the renewal of the church depends on a response to the race crisis. But one who listens to the chorus hears a harsh counterpoint. On one side there are those, including most top Protestant leaders, who insist that within the past year the churches have "come of age." When Dr. Eugene Carson Blake faced arrest in a Baltimore amusement park last summer, Presbyterian Life magazine wrote of the incident as if the millenium had arrived. Indeed, the mere fact of participation in the struggle was probably enough to convince many Protestant publicists that relevance had finally been attained.

But the other side of the chorus, much smaller in size, is raising insistent questions, questions that must be answered if Protestants are to come to grips with the whole meaning of America's racial upheaval. Does the Church really understand its mission in race relations in a Christian context, or is it jumping on a secular bandwagon in the hope of saving face? Are Christians understanding the race problem in Biblical terms, or are they resting their case for equality on arguments that are no different from the arguments of a good citizen who does not share the Christian faith? Does the Church have a right to criticize society without putting its own house in order?

The man who has pressed questions such as these farther than many of his associates would wish is the Rev. Will D. Campbell, Director of a new organization called the Committee of Southern Churchmen. His story should illuminate the question of the role of the Church in the race struggle.

Campbell is a white man. He was born to life on a 67-acre cotton farm in a Mississippi town bearing the incongruous name Liberty. During Depression days, in mid-childhood, Campbell received an early lesson in race relations. He and his playmates taunted a colored passer-by with the hated epithet, "nigger." His grandfather told them: "All the niggers are dead, there are only colored people now." But when Campbell grew up to become a minister who led Negro children to school in Little Rock, he alienated the people back home. Now he can feel no righteous sense of rebellion at having shunned the South's traditional racial attitudes because he knows there are members of his family and others throughout the South who are in a tragic position. They see the writing on the wall. They eat their guts out over the problem. But they cannot change.

What is guilt for the white "liberal" in the South? Isn't it departing from the accepted norm? Does not the white Southerner praying for racial justice also secretly petition: "Father, forgive me for not being a segregationist?" Without this insight, the liberal who journeys from the segregated cities of the North to liberate the South just does not understand. Yet if Campbell had to choose between accepting or rejecting the naive invasions from the North he would say, in most cases, though not without a trace of irony, "Let them come on."

When he graduated from Yale Divinity School, Campbell took a parish in Louisiana, then became a chaplain at the University of Mississippi. He intended to remain at Ole Miss the rest of his life. He was actually there just slightly more than two years. The story of his short tenure on the Ole Miss campus in instructive.

It became known that a speaker Campbell had invited to appear at a religious emphasis week was a contributor to the NAACP. The University raised a fuss and the engagement was cancelled. Campbell responded by refusing to find a substitute. The religious emphasis week became a week of silent prayer for students who were very much aware of why silence was made necessary.

Later, in the summer of 1956, Campbell tried to talk a young Negro Baptist preacher into taking a correspondence course at the University. He invited the light skinned Negro to the campus and the two played a game of ping pong in one of the University buildings. A hostile student called the University's Assistant Registrar who demanded of Campbell, "Was he a nigger?" Campbell replied, "Well, if you can't tell the difference, what difference does it make?"

After that the going became rough. Campbell was investigated by the White Citizens Council and the State Sovereignty Commission. He and his wife received intimidating letters and calls. Someone spiked punch at a reception for incoming students with human waste.

The situation became intolerable and Campbell left to join the National Council of Churches Department of Racial and Cultural Relations as head of its Southern Office in Nashville, Tenn., where he has lived ever since.

It was during his time with the National Council that Campbell's theological understanding of the race problem began to mature, partly in reaction to the official views of the National Council. The National Council viewed Campbell more or less as "our man in the South." His function was to keep tabs on the racial situation and "to aid the churches in crystallizing a position of action in the solution of community problems in the South."

Campbell grew to see his role in two ways. He could, by virtue of birth and background, go where Northerners feared to tread and help behind the scenes in the resolution of racial conflicts. This he has done with a finesse that has led the Field Foundation to call him an "indispensible man" in the South. His second, and for him more important role, was to be a preacher to the Southern churches. The job was not to bully the churches into action (a futile process in most cases), but to convince them that racial justice has to do with the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Nowhere in the nation are people more "religious" than in the South. What they need is honest preaching, not from the treatises of Social Work but from the Bible they have known from childhood.

Campbell summed it up in one of the best books to date on religion and race, his Race and The Renewal of The Church: "When a church organization needs personnel in the field of human relations it is inclined to look for effective, skilled social reformers or human engineers, but rarely preachers and prophets. . . . All our human engineering is vain if we miss the unambiguous point that, in the (Christian) message, race is irrelevant. The only relevant point has to do with redemption, not race, class, or caste. . . . It might have been better if the Supreme Court had not ruled favorably on the subject of race. Then we would have been forced to speak, if we spoke at all, from the vantage point of the Christian gospel. We would have been required to say, Thus saith the Lord! Not, Thus saith the law! . . . If all church institutions, colleges and universities, hospitals, secondary and primary schools, camps, assembly grounds, homes for the aged and orphanages were open to all, there would not be very much remaining for society to do."

The point of what Campbell is saying is so simple that it is a mystery to determine why his "preaching" has proved an enigma to National Council officials and others. He seems to be saying that it might be well for a Christian involved in race relations to preach to the segregationist (and to integrationists) from the standpoint of the Christian Gospel. Now there may be those who argue that the Christian Gospel is confusing and subject to different interpretations. But Campbell's point is that if one is to work within the Church, then one should be subject to the Church's understanding, regardless of how difficult that might be. For to come to a Christian position on race relations from any other perspective is not to renew the churches but to blatently deny that the Church has anything at all to say.

Besides, Campbell contends with great wisdom that the segregationist, both Northern and Southern, is well equipped to argue the issues on secular grounds. But how can he argue, asks Campbell, when faced with the fact that God in Christ reconciled all men to Himself and that, by definition, there is in Christ neither slave nor free, Jew nor Greek.

A word to the South from the South

An added question: The Christian understands that all men are involved in the network of sin that enmeshes our world. The Negro is no better than the white. But, in forfeiting their distinctive understanding, Christians are forced to identify lock, stock and barrel with the aims and ideology of the civil rights groups, aims often every bit as selfish (whether justified or not) as the aims of the segregationist.

The severing of Campbell's relationship with the National Council was a direct result of his interpretation of his job in terms of preaching rather than social engineering. At the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race, Campbell prepared a speech in which he indicated that Negroes—human nature being equal—were as likely to do violence to whites as vice versa. He went on to say that the churches should purify their own theology if they are interested in renewing themselves. Campbell's reference to the evil potentialities of Negroes caused panic among National Council officials who prevailed upon him to eliminate the reference from his address. It was not politic, they felt, to say that Negroes were equally bad in relation to whites, though it was perfectly all right to say they were equally good.

This, among other things, triggered Campbell's resignation from the National Council in the summer of 1963.

When he resigned, Campbell was determined to set up an organization that would mirror his conviction that the race problem should be met with the Christian Gospel rather than a humanistic approach. Before long he had organized a group of Southern ministers and laymen to form The Committee of Southern Churchmen. The Committee, with Campbell as the full time staff member, seeks to do three things. Members are committed to preach the Gospel in the South, offering assistance to Christians who are seeking to break the bonds of a heretical, segregationist religion. The Committee will seek to help deposed clergymen remain in the South as "preachers at large." And Committee members will travel to racial trouble spots to bring aid to church groups caught in the despair of hate and indecision. The aim of the Committee is the renewal of the churches of the South. With members in twelve Southern states it seeks to work within the churches to raise basically one question: What does it mean when we say, "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to Himself."

Campbell believes Northern Christians should devote more time to urban problems

Campbell feels at home in his new job. He can preach to his heart's content without questioning memoranda from New York. And, despite his disclaimers, he will continue to function as a wise and seasoned observer of the social realities in his part of the nation, offering counsel to the wide number of persons who seek it.

What Campbell is saying is relevant to the North, for it is becoming plain that the same attitudes exist there. Ministers may preach on the Bill of Rights and the Constitution and the newspaper headlines, but it is clear that significant renewal will involve self-understanding in the light of the Gospel. And for one who regards the Campbell approach with curiosity and perhaps a feeling that it might be an honest one for the Church to pursue, a good starting task would be to read the following from the inaugural declaration of the Committee of Southern Churchmen:

> In dying for all men, Christ destroyed every barrier which denies fellowship, brotherhood, and community between and among all men. Beginning in the Church, therefore, worldly standards must cease to count in relationships among men, or Christ's death and resurrection are mocked. But we in the South have made distinctions of our own creation between men. . . . Thereby, we have contradicted in our faith and life the unity of all men created by God's act in Christ: we have proclaimed the order of the world instead of the Kingdom of Christ; we have crucified Christ anew; we have led the Church to become like the nations, instead of being a light to the nations. But "when anyone is united in Christ, there is a new world. . . . From first to last this has been the work of God." He has reconciled all men to himself and he has entrusted to us the service of reconciliation. We proclaim in faith and with our lives that Christ's reconciliation of all men is neither social stratagem or political expedient, but the gift of God that has and does and will liberate men from bondage and death—forever more, but also while still in life.

The churches cannot save themselves through good works in race relations; the suggestion is rather that a true church, by definition, makes no room for race. If the church is the last institution to desegregate, Campbell's critics may be forced to wonder if there was not some point in the preaching of this somewhat enigmatic man from Mississippi.

In The Northern Suburbs

BREAKING THE HOUSING BARRIER

By CAROL KLEIMAN

The house on Blackhawk lane in Park Forest, a development community 25 miles south of Chicago's Loop, is a small, two bedroom home, modest by anyone's standards.

Yet, it is very special: Its owners, Jacqueline and Terry Robbins, are one of the first Negro families to move into this community of almost 30,000 whites.

They and their two young sons have lived there for almost one-year-and-one-half. There has been no violence. There have been no threats. The Robbins are part of the community.

This, unfortunately, is not true for Negroes in other suburban communities. Violence and hatred are grim realities to be faced.

In many American suburbs, however, private groups of plain citizens have gotten together to try to make their strong feelings for equal housing opportunities known. Community statements, with hundreds of signatures, have been gathered and published by such suburbs as Evanston, Glenview, Winnetka, Wilmette, and Hinsdale, not to mention numerous other suburbs throughout the country.

Religious statements have been made in the papers, too. Appeals and support for freedom of residence have been given from the pulpit of almost every church and synagogue in the suburbs.

Human Relations Committees are being formed. Discussions and workshops are being held. In each suburb surrounding Chicago, individuals are trying to locate homes for sale whose owners will sell to Negroes. Each day, more and more people become involved in the effort. Even in the suburbs, integration must be faced.

Skokie now has five Negro families living throughout its large village. Most people are not aware of it, which points up the great progress that has been made by that town. Four years ago, when the first Negro family moved in, the story was not a pleasant one. There were threats, violence, intimidation until common sense took over.

A Negro's buying a suburban home is one thing. Real estate agents do all they can to thwart this. Rumors of a Negro even looking at a house usually cause panic among the neighbors, a panic the real estate agents play on.

What then is so different about Park Forest, where eight Negro families now live peacefully, where real estate values have been maintained, where white persons continue to buy and rent in what they know is an integrated—even only slightly—community? Why haven't the vacancy rates increased? Where is the panic?

"Some unpleasant things have happened, but nothing terrible. And the reason nothing terrible happened is that there is an active group of responsible citizens in Park Forest who made sure nothing did."

That is Terry Robbins' explanation for his relatively quiet move into Park Forest. Terry is a good-looking young man in his late 20s. He is a chemist with Nalco, was, in fact, the first Negro chemist the company hired.

Telborn Smyth

Terry was born in Alabama and came to Chicago as a child. He lived on the South Side, went to school there. He's a graduate of Wilson Jr. College and Roosevelt University. Jackie, his attractive wife, also in her late 20s, was born in Chicago, majored in sociology at Wilson.

The Robbins' educational background and professional status fit into the general Park Forest picture. The community was developed in 1948 and has consistently attracted the young man on his way up. Because of this, there is a large turnover of homeowners and rentals—people are going on to bigger and better things. But the turnover is no larger than that of, say, Levittown or any other developmental community. Houses range from $11,000 to $30,000, with most houses at $20,000. There are also rentals and cooperatives.

Terry heard about Park Forest from a co-worker at Nalco. "We were living in Englewood, a blighted area," he explained. "The owner of our apartment building let it run downhill. He stopped planting grass. We always had furnace trouble. And yet we were paying high rents."

"That was only one part of it," said Jackie. "The boys were really suffering from the schools. Kevin is now 8 and Keith, 9. We had brought them up to love school, to love learning, to love to read.

"After a few years in school, they were beginning to lose this. Keith had seven substitute teachers in one marking period, none fully-certified. This can be devastating to a child. We spoke better grammar at home than the boys were learning in school.

"I was active in the PTA, but we got nowhere. Kevin was transferred to the first mobile unit, the Willis Wagons. We had a sit-in. We picketed. We protested. We could do nothing.

"To make matters worse, the boys were on double shifts. And, by the time we moved, both my sons were in mobile units."

Both Jackie and Terry were strongly aware of the importance of education to their sons. She constantly checked on the children's progress. She learned some disturbing things: The students were not allowed to take books home; yet, her boys wanted to read more. Teachers were forced to spend most of their time maintaining discipline in the overcrowded classes. Her boys were bored.

With a frequent turnover of teachers, crowded classes, the hated Willis Wagons for classrooms, the boys got the message implicit in such treatment: Nobody cared very much about them or what they did. And they began to act accordingly.

"I managed to get special privileges for them by being persistent," Jackie said. "But I felt so horrible about it. What about the boys whose mothers were not there fighting for them? And what had I really won anyway? The schools were terrible."

This decided them. They had to move.

Where can a Negro couple move to in the Chicago area? And how? The tight, white ring of suburbs that surrounds Chicago is almost as inflexible as the minds that have created it. Developers, builders, real estate agencies are cruel and precise when it comes to blocking Negroes' efforts to move out of the ghetto.

Developers, builders and real estate agencies will often permit a Negro to look at a house that is for sale. They do this because they know absolutely they will not sell to him, nor will the people they represent. So they don't mind being condescendingly polite.

The hypocrisy of these men is covered up by a favorite apology of theirs: "Oh, we're not prejudiced. We're just representing the wishes of the owners."

In Glenview, recently, this thin cover was easily pierced, but no one is very happy to find out what they knew all along: some real estate agents further racial hatred.

A house was listed with a Glenview real estate agency. The owner moved to California. He wrote the agency he wanted his house shown on a nondiscriminatory basis. The letter was never answered. He wrote again. He sent a friend in to check on the agency's honoring of their contract. The friend brought a Negro with her, a man who wanted to look at the house. They were turned down flat. Absolutely not, they were told—despite the owner's request.

Rather than show the home to a Negro, when the owner had said he would sell to anyone who wanted to buy, the agency said it would return the key to the owner. They offered to buy the house. The offer was turned down.

This is an ugly story, but only one of many, and it is repeated daily in the suburbs, where Negroes are barred from many homes for sale.

The alternative is to practice deception, such as was done in Skokie. There, a white man bought the house the Negro couple was permitted to look at. Within a few minutes of completing the closing purchase of the house, the white buyer immediately sold it to the Negro couple.

But a Negro's troubles only begin there. Most banks deny them mortgages when they learn the purchase is a home in a previously unintegrated community. Fire, theft, personal property insurance are also extremely difficult to obtain.

Often, once the couple has managed to get over those hurdles, sufficient police protection is not given. They are harassed, threatened, put under tremendous pressure and danger.

The irony of the horror the real estate agents, builders and developers have wrought is that real estate is very slow in the Chicago area. There are high vacancy rates, slow turnover of houses. Most persons selling homes sustain a loss. If homes were offered on an open basis, the market would be brisk, active and profitable.

One of the few lucrative real estate markets in this area is Hyde Park, which is a community where freedom of residence has been put into action. It is a manifest example of the truism that integration is good business.

The Robbins knew everything was stacked against them, but they decided to take the big step.

"We didn't have enough money to buy; we planned to rent," Terry said. Their first choice was Hyde Park, but rentals were too high.

"I came out to Park Forest and put in an application for a rental unit," Terry said with a wry smile. "There were many advertisements for rentals, and a high vacancy rate. Everyone else—the white applicants, that is—was accepted then and there. But I was told the Board would have to approve my application."

Terry really hadn't expected too much trouble. He knew a Negro professor had lived for a while in the community and had been respected. The professor had sold his house to a white couple four years previously when he had been offered an attractive teaching post at an important New York university.

There had been no violence when the professor had bought his home in Park Forest. What Terry Robbins didn't know was that the professor had a great deal of difficulty in buying his home in the first place; and that the only reason there was not violence at that time was due to the efforts of dedicated, responsible Park Forest neighbors.

Terry's hopes for a home in Park Forest had also been based on the reputation of the builders for being "liberals," active in welfare work and community-minded men.

That was his hope, but the reality did not bear him out.

"I was shocked and disappointed when two weeks later, the check I had left as a deposit came back in a plain white envelope, no letter, nothing. Later, I did get a phone call saying the Board did not entertain our application at that time. But nothing in writing."

Investigation showed that the first Negro couple had gone through the same thing. They had tried to buy a home and were kept waiting eight months, during which time they were asked to come back weekend after weekend. But the developers never sold them a house. They had finally purchased a home from an individual in Park Forest who was selling his home privately.

The story on the developers of Park Forest is difficult to track down. They have claimed they rent, sell and re-sell on a non-discriminatory basis. Yet, despite the many applications through the years, they have never rented, sold or re-sold a house to a Negro.

There is no proof the developers have ever said no to a Negro, despite the returning of checks, despite the long delays. There is proof, however, they have never said yes to a Negro: Any Negro family in Park Forest has gotten there by buying from private individuals, through GI or FHA defaults or from buying, privately, into cooperatives.

CAROL KLEIMAN lives in Glenview, Ill., and writes a weekly column for the Chicago Sun-Times.

When the Robbins got their check back from the developers, they were downcast. But a friend of theirs, sympathetic with their plight, contacted Harry Teshina, an engineer who lives in Park Forest.

They couldn't have met a better man. Teshina has lived in Park Forest for 15 years. An Oriental, he came to Chicago from the West Coast and had his own troubles getting into the development. Teshina, for the past six years, has been working as a representative of Housing Opportunities Made Equal (HOME) in Park Forest.

This is a somewhat informal group which seeks persons willing to sell to Negroes. HOME shows the Negroes around the community, introduces them to some of their neighbors and makes sure their move-in is safe and sane.

This is what must be done to counteract the blocking techniques of realtors, developers and builders. Very few Negroes can move into an all-white suburb themselves. A great deal of help, advice and friendly hands and hearts are needed.

Teshina and his group had helped greatly with the first Negro's move-in. Teshina called Terry, encouraged him to buy instead of rent and asked to meet him.

"It is not enough for any of us to sit by and say what is happening is wrong," says Teshina. "We must assume responsibility for it."

Teshina and a handful of responsible friends ("We don't even have a name.") started to work to help the Robbins. They are all representatives of HOME and live in Park Forest, but, as Teshina puts it, "we're more of a real estate office than a social agency."

It was in the fall of 1962 that Jackie and Terry decided to buy. The federal government had let it be clearly known there was to be no discrimination in its VA and FHA foreclosure sales. This shows the necessity of laws to help the Negro. What happened in Glenview could not have happened with an open occupancy law. The Robbins took heart.

Through Teshina, the Robbins looked at a house similar to the one they were interested in buying. This can only be done in a development, of course, and forestalls unreasonable panic.

The house the Robbins wanted was selling for $12,000. They would be the third owners. It was only natural Terry wanted to see the exact house himself. He called a local realtor and made an appointment. He told them he was a Negro. They told him to come out. He did, but no one was there except an assistant secretary. Everyone else had disappeared. Still, because of the federal law, the agency could not say no. Terry was given the key and went to look at the house alone.

"I looked at it so fast, I got the wrong measurements for our rugs," he smiled, "but I guess it was better than not looking at it at all."

He decided to take over the mortgage and bought the home from the VA. From this point on, Teshina and his friends and the Human Relations Commission, an official arm of the community, took over the actual planning of their moving in.

The Robbins were invited to homes of people in the community, to meet them, to make friends. "The feeling we developed from these meetings gave us the strength to get over the difficult times," said Terry. "We felt they were natural. We didn't feel they were being 'nice.' We believed they meant it."

The chairman of the Human Relations Commission contacted the family in Chicago. Park Forest's Commission was set up 10 years ago, after the Cicero riots. It has been doing an excellent job getting community support behind smooth move-ins.

The Robbins were advised not to be around the house too much until the day they moved in. Jackie did not see her new home until the day she moved in.

The couple was advised to have an unlisted phone, to use a mover (he would do the job quickly and give a sense of stability to the process), to put curtains up immediately and not to worry.

The Police Chief spoke to Robbins in advance, too, and also assured him his rights as a homeowner would be protected. Police cars would patrol the neighborhood.

With the Robbins' move, similar to the first Negro move-in, the political and ruling bodies of the community—the Village Board, the police, the Village prosecutor—had one attitude, one concern: Law and order. Once a person was a resident, he had all the rights the others did, they believed. They did not encourage Negroes to move in, they said, but their cooperation in maintaining the peace is what made peace possible.

Members of the Commission, of the Village Board and from the police department visited homes in a three block radius of the Robbins' home. Each homeowner was told the new buyers' rights would be protected. A fact sheet on Robbins and his family was distributed throughout the neighborhood.

Two persons objected strenuously. They said they would have a meeting. The Human Relations Commission asked to have one of its members present to help answer questions. The meeting was held—but no one came.

One of the objectors was the neighbor next door, who has moved. (A white family moved in.) He put up a fence. His side, he painted white; the Robbins' side, black. He did it during the night. The next night, without the Robbins' knowledge, some of their neighbors got together and painted the Robbins' side of the fence white, too.

In December, 1962, the Robbins moved into their new home, followed the advice given them to the letter. "We put the curtains up so fast, we had to take them down later and do it right," said Jackie.

A group of her new neighbors helped her clean up the house and unpack. At night, their husbands helped rearrange furniture and put up shelves. The people who wanted to be good neighbors were; no one heard from the others.

"It wasn't the best way in the world to move into a home," says Terry, "but it was without incident. We are grateful for that." It was the Christmas season, and neighbors sent over cakes and cookies and made personal visits to welcome the new family.

The Robbins took the big step and now seven other Negro families have moved into Park Forest. None is in the same area; none of their children are in the same schools. Some are buyers, some are renting. And a Negro family, the newest, has bought into a cooperative. All without incident. But not without hard work.

The Robbins know their situation is not ideal. They often feel the hostility of some of their neighbors. They know there is a long, long way to go before they are accepted as being just like anyone else. But meanwhile, they are living full lives.

The boys are in an excellent school, have many friends, go to overnight parties, keep busy all day. Not everyone likes them, but those who call them names Keith and Kevin dismiss as being "stupid."

Jackie belongs to her area's babysitting group, sits about once a week. She's active in the League of Women Voters and in her church. She is taking religious and cultural studies from the Ecumenical Council of the Calvary-United Protestant Church. Terry is on the board of the Chicago Church Federation Layman's Division, which covers all of Cook County.

Both husband and wife are members of the South Suburban Human Relations Council. Terry belongs to a car pool with other workers from Nalco who live in Park Forest. "It was interesting to me, though," adds Terry, "that the man who told us to be sure to look here was quite upset when we did. He has since left both Park Forest and Nalco."

The family goes to community-sponsored musicals, Jackie has joined the PTA.

"We're much more relaxed now about living here," said Jackie. "It was so hard at first. But everyone has gone out of their way to let us know we have every right to be here."

"Of course we do," said Terry. "Almost all the excitement has died down. After all, we're old residents now."

And so they are.

SELF HELP IN HYDE PARK

By ELEANOR PETERSEN

Dr. and Mrs. James Smith, well to do Negroes, wished to move to a suburb. A house was found, the owner pleased to sell, the suburban community quite satisfied that a Negro family was to be living there. Everything was worked out. But the Smiths never moved in. Why? They could not get a mortgage.

This wall of financial prejudice is one of the key reasons for segregated housing in Chicago. How can Negroes escape from the ghetto if they find it practically impossible to obtain financing for buying homes in suburbs or all-white neighborhoods?

Today if the hypothetical Smiths wished to buy their suburban home, they now could find a mortgage. Where? At Hyde Park Federal Savings and Loan Association, a savings institution organized because an interracial Chicago neighborhood could not, itself, get needed mortgage and home improvement financing. The story of this Association and its operation sheds light on the whole question of open occupancy in the city and suburbs.

The Association is located in the Hyde Park - Kenwood community, home of the University of Chicago. Physically, the neighborhood is quite attractive with many fine old homes as well as apartment buildings. Its residents include University faculty and a high proportion of professional and business people.

Immediately after the Second World War, the community began to decline. Blight increased. As Negroes moved in from the western edges, white families fled to the suburbs. The Hyde Park - Kenwood Community Conference was formed to "maintain a stable, interracial community of high standards." Citizen participation in block groups and intensive staff work against building violations halted the panic.

The University of Chicago through its political action arm, the South East Chicago Commission, helped secure the first major urban renewal program in the country for this community. Under this plan, 20% of the worst buildings were to be demolished with new housing and commercial centers planned to replace them. The remaining 80% of the area was to be rehabilitated. This would mean apartment buildings deconverted, boarding houses restored to single family dwellings, building code violations corrected. It meant a drastic reversal from the destruction of the community to its rebuilding and rebirth. What Hyde Park needed were families and investors willing to purchase these buildings and rehabilitate them. Only if the 80% of the community could be upgraded would urban renewal succeed.

But there was a major obstacle, the same obstacle which kept the Smiths from owning a home in the suburbs. Despite the tremendous amount of federal and city funds being spent in the area, there was not enough private capital coming in to this interracial area for the job of rehabilitation. Families who wanted to buy old homes and improve them could not find a financial institution willing to make the mortgage. Home owners who wished to improve their property could not get home improvement loans. Money could not be found to deconvert apartment buildings, nor to bring them up to code standards.

As the situation grew more critical, a small group of community leaders met to face the problem and explore possible solutions. This group included Paul Berger, an insurance executive who was the leader in the effort. Others were by occupation: two professors of the University School of Business Administration, a housewife, an attorney, and a manufacturer. It became apparent that a savings and loan association organized in Hyde Park could supply much of the financing and, if successful, would encourage other savings institutions to make loans in the interracial area. An organizing committee was formed, made up of representatives of various groups within the community, both Negro and white. This committee began the long, tedious process of organizing a new savings institution.

The Committee first made application to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for a charter. Their application refused, the group spent six months looking for a small, older association willing to move to Hyde Park. This failing, the group returned to the FHLBB and again petitioned for a charter. This time on the basis of the great need for rehabilitation funds in the urban renewal area, the group was given permission to proceed to organize. The requirements were unusually high: $1,250,000.00 in pledges must be raised from at least 750 persons within six months.

An empty popcorn store in the Hyde Park Shopping Center was the group's office. The intensive push to raise the pledges began. Thousands of letters went out to neighbors, wives of the committee members as well as friends spent long hours soliciting support. Finally on March 1st, 1961, the goal was met: over $1,500,000.00 was raised from a community that realized the seriousness of the problem and believed that such an Association could solve it. The Association was granted the first federal charter in Chicago in over ten years.

From July 1, 1961, when Hyde Park Federal first opened its doors until today, Hyde Park continues its enthusiastic support of the Association. The Association has made over $1,500,000.00 in mortgages and improvement loans in Hyde Park, and as the group hoped, this success has caused other savings institutions to invest in an interracial neighborhood. Julian Levi, executive director of the South East Chicago Commission, recently reported to the Commission's annual meeting that the two principal factors assuring success of the urban renewal program and the rebirth of Hyde Park were the University of Chicago and Hyde Park Federal.

It is the role of Hyde Park Federal in rebuilding not only a decaying urban community but an INTERRACIAL community that makes this experience relevant to the greater problem of maintaining healthy neighborhoods throughout the city. Most experts on the problems of our urban centers are convinced that if the city is to be a healthy, functioning part of our society, it must hold its white, middle-income families. And it must allow its growing Negro population to disperse throughout the city's neighborhoods.

If this is to happen Negro families must have the financing to buy homes in all-white or interracial neighborhoods, and equally important, white families wishing to live in interracial areas should be able to secure mortgages. The rigid pattern of mortgages for Negroes only in all Negro areas, and for whites only in all white areas must be changed. It is this unwillingness of financial institutions to mortgage white families who wish to remain or move into blocks where Negroes live that helps create and hasten the rapid change from an all-white block to an all-Negro block.

An additional difficulty for Negroes buying their own homes is finding insurance to protect their property. Most Negro families insuring their homes pay higher premiums for poorer coverage than white families. Hyde Park Federal has pioneered in this field also. Savings and loan associations offer insurance on the homes they mortgage. When Hyde Park Federal was organized, the Board of Directors, through its insurance agent, approached one of the largest insurance companies in the city to handle its policies. The condition was that the company take all policies on white and Negro homes and treat them identically. After much persuasion, including a tour of the area, the company agreed. It marks a real "first" in the field of insuring homes for Negroes.

Today Hyde Park Federal is making mortgages to Negro families not only in its own community but in neighborhoods throughout Chicago and the suburbs. In cooperation with the Catholic Interracial Council and the American Friends Service Committee it has mortgaged the homes of the first Negro families moving into the all-white suburbs of Niles and Brookfield. And the Association's experience has convinced its Board of Directors that loans to qualified Negro families are as safe as loans to qualified whites.

Board members at Hyde Park Federal

The growth of the Association has been outstanding. Its assets are now over $8,000,000.00. Savers number more than 4,000. This represents a gain of over 600% in two and one-half years of operation. In this short time, Hyde Park Federal has assumed a role of importance in the city's financial community for its success in combining sound, conservative fiscal policy with non-discriminatory lending practice. The Association has used this outstanding record to put pressure on other financial institutions to modify their rigid lending policies.

While Hyde Park Federal began as a neighborhood savings institution it has attracted national attention for its non-discriminatory lending policies. Particularly, since the National Conference On Religion and Race was held in Chicago last year, religious institutions have been interested in the Association. The Conference stated

> Church and synagogue have a moral obligation to use more than monetary consideration in the expenditure and investment of their funds . . . The funds of religious institutions should be invested with a conscious goal of furthering equality of opportunity, particularly through investments in integrated housing projects and developments and through the use of such funds to facilitate mortgage loans to Negro buyers.

Such national religious bodies as the Unitarian - Universalist Association, the American Friends Service Committee, and the American Baptist Convention have opened accounts. Locally, numerous churches and temples have chosen Hyde Park Federal to invest their funds in. Labor unions, educational institutions, charitable organizations, are putting their funds in an institution which is carrying out the principles these groups are working for.

Paul H. Berger, Chairman of the Board, sums it up: "Hyde Park Federal is an interracial savings association because our community is interracial. What we have accomplished in the field of making mortgages available to Negro families is also only a natural outgrowth of our experience of white and Negro families living together in Hyde Park. Because of our experience we believe that equal housing opportunity is basic to solving equality for Negroes. First and most important, white and Negro families must have the opportunity to live in the same communities. This is the important first step. Those people and their organizations which believe in this equality should realize the power of their own money to help bring it about, or to prevent it from happening. They should insist that their savings institutions adopt non-discriminatory lending principles. When people understand that their money can work for their belief in equality, not against it, our society will make rapid progress toward real freedom of residence."

THE CHURCH AND THE 20TH CENTURY FAMILY

[A rector's newsletter to his parish]

I am feeling nostalgic for the good old days this morning. Not that I ever knew those days, but I have read about them in my history books. The Church used to speak with authority. When the Church spoke, the institutions of business, education, politics, law, medicine, charity and welfare, craftsmanship, and war listened. Several of these institutions were the direct responsibility of the Church; the others were guided and directly influenced by precepts taught by the Church.

Today the Church is like a mother whose family is nearly grown up. This is not to say that because these institutions have come of age they are always mature and wise in their decisions; often they are not, and fragile civilization trembles sometimes with the nearness of disaster. To speak of the major institutions of life as having grown up means simply that the authority of Mother Church in these areas is no longer significant. They are out on their own now. Whatever attention they may pay to the Church is like the attention we pay our parents after we have left home: respect, of course, but we make our own decisions now, and we find that we're doing quite well. Naturally, mother grieves to see her children grow up, leave home, and begin to meet the problems of life on their own, but the wise mother knows that to try to keep her young ones home and dependent upon her is against human nature.

I have been told that the one institution still at home with Mother Church is the family. For some families this is undoubtedly true, but for many suburban middle-class families, I doubt it. For instance, the Church assumes in its service for the Solemnization of Matrimony that the man and woman exchanging vows are entering into a relationship that takes precedence over all other relationships except a person's relationship to God. 'I take thee . . . to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part. . . .' This is what the Church teaches. Most of us repeated these words solemnly when we were married, and we believed that they were good and true. Our work was seen as secondary to this contract. 'We work to support our families' is the way we customarily put it. And, when necessary, we would change jobs in order to support our families.

When I look at what is actually happening in some families, I see something else: in fact, I see the opposite. In an increasing number of cases, the Church would be truer to the facts of the situation if instead of witnessing and blessing the vows exchanged between husband and wife, it witnessed and blessed the contract established between the man and his work. In these families work is the basic relationship, and it takes precedence over marriage and family. The wife is expected to support her husband in his work. If she fails to play a harmonious second fiddle to her husband's career, she ceases to be useful, and their marriage deteriorates into a more or less tolerable 'getting along' or, perhaps, divorce.

To avoid this, three abilities seem to be helpful: (1) She should be a good manager of the home so that home problems and the children don't interfere with her husband's plans; (2) she should be an attractive ornament to her husband when with him in public and social life; (3) she should be a willing partner when her husband seeks relief and consolation from the frustrations of his work. In return for these services, the wife can expect a measure of social status, a high standard of living, and adequate resources to pay the doctor for listening to her 'problems'. If she comes to her clergyman, he will be pleased that someone thought he could be helpful, but beyond listening sympathetically, he can't help her without helping her husband free himself from working sixty-five hours a week, and her husband can't be helped because he has to work these hours if he wants the job, and the job demands can't be changed because this is what it takes for a business to be successful. So this is where I came in. I'm fighting nostalgia for the good old days when it seemed that the Church could no something. The last child to stay home, the family, has begun to move out, and there is not much left.

Sincerely,
The Rector

P.S. The moral of this meditation is not that we should feel guilty toward the Church and seek ways to reassure each other that things haven't changed much. Some of us who have found that commitment to Jesus has brought a measure of freedom and significance into our lives will want to pursue what it means to be a Christian in the 20th Century, and we will be hoping to find ways for the Church, perhaps in new forms, to be real and relevant help in our search. Many more people, however, will want simply to know how to be a family in the 20th Century. So be it. The tragedy to be avoided is for us to defend the Church's vested interests and to seek to recoup its 'losses'. If the Church (which includes you and me) can put aside its nostalgia for worldly authority and give up itself for the sake of humanity, it will recover the only legitimate authority it ever possessed. Pray that the Holy Spirit will keep us faithful.

The Woodrow Wilson Internship Program

THE WOODROW WILSON INTERNSHIP PROGRAM

The first Wilson Interns joined the faculties of twelve Southern colleges in September, 1963. They were former Woodrow Wilson Fellows who had been in graduate school for at least two years, and had decided to take a year off from their studies in order to gain some teaching experience. In addition to the normal obligations of young instructors, the Interns had a special task. With their classroom teaching load reduced by one third, Interns paid special attention to bright students who might be encouraged through private tutorials or informal discussion groups to consider graduate study and careers in college teaching.

Origins of the Program

For several years, the chairmen of the Foundation's regional selection committees had been reporting an untapped reservoir of talent for college teaching. These were the students who appeared at interviews apparently able to attend graduate school, but lacking breadth and depth in their liberal arts training. More study would be necessary in order for them to take full advantage of the resources that graduate schools provide. Selection committees were reluctant to gamble on these students and reluctant to let them slip by. The complaint was frequently heard among southern committees, and referred often to students from predominantly Negro colleges and universities. These institutions were known to have an exceptionally difficult task confronting them because of the inadequate preparation their students had received at the secondary level. Their students were more used to planning for careers in medicine and law, and especially elementary and high school teaching, than for graduate study in the liberal arts, which was in any case often not a practical career ambition.

In 1960 the Foundation had begun to experiment with several new programs designed to retrieve these able but less well prepared students. In cooperation with the Southern Education Foundation, selected Fellows were offered an extra summer of study prior to their first year in graduate school. By 1964 the Foundation served as the selection agent for an enlarged program of summer scholarships. Through it, the Southern Education Foundation provided 72 scholarships at seven southern summer schools for seniors and juniors from predominantly Negro institutions. While these awards were not tied as the others had been to Wilson Fellowships, there was evidence that most seniors taking the scholarships would be going on to graduate school eventually.

In a third program, the Foundation invited 28 candidates for Woodrow Wilson Fellowships to take an extra year at selected institutions. During 1964-65 Fellows would take mostly undergraduate courses and one or two courses at the graduate level, in the hope that in the following year they would qualify for regular Wilson Fellowships. The first year of the Qualifying Year Awards proved the value of this extra work in facilitating the progress of some Wilson Fellows through graduate school.

When Hans Rosenhaupt paid a visit to a group of Woodrow Wilson Fellows at Cornell in 1962, the Foundation had just taken a further experimental step by sponsoring Wilson Honors Seminars at several predominantly Negro institutions. The interdisciplinary seminars were an attempt to broaden the liberal arts background of the colleges' best students. How to make such students more attractive to the nation's graduate schools was much on Mr. Rosenhaupt's mind.

The Fellows' Response

At the meeting, the Cornell Fellows sounded a familiar complaint. Graduate schools seemed remote from the outside world, and one's scholarship there had the most intangible relationship to preparation for the other side of academe, college teaching. After two years many Fellows were uncertain about their careers, stale in their research, and suffering a loss of idealism. Hans Rosenhaupt suggested a year off to do some college teaching—perhaps in a predominantly Negro college.

Fellows' response was immediate and warm at Cornell, and wherever else Mr. Rosenhaupt offered the Foundation's help in securing teaching jobs. The change of scene would revitalize Fellows' studies. The experience of teaching full time would help Fellows reaffirm their interest in teaching careers. And for those who wished to do it, teaching in a Negro college would provide an opportunity for positive action in an area where many had felt keen responsibility, but had not found a means of expressing their beliefs.

Of course, not all Fellows were interested in leaving graduate school for a year. Some Fellows felt that the Foundation was contradicting its own Dissertation Fellowship program, which offered encouragement to Fellows who could complete their doctoral work within four years. The Internship Program offered assistance to Fellows who were willing to defer their doctorate. The Foundation admitted the contradiction and then asked, "Why not?" Many Fellows would prefer to continue their graduate work, and for them a Dissertation Fellowship would be helpful. Others feeling an immediate need to teach would find an internship valuable. Eventually many Fellows would become teaching interns after completing their doctorates.

The First Year

By the spring of 1963 the outlines of the Woodrow Wilson Internship Program were essentially drawn. Using the Foundation as a clearing house, officers of the Foundation recommended prospective Wilson Interns to colleges which had been invited to send requests for persons in specific fields. An essential ingredient of the three-way relationship was that the college was to release a third or quarter of the Interns' teaching time for independent work with selected students. In return, the Foundation agreed to pay an equivalent portion of the Interns' salaries. The program offered to colleges not only new faculty of a high calibre, but an unexpected resource for the preparation of bright students for graduate school.

Dean Charles Hounshell of Emory University, one of the Foundation's regional chairmen, took over the task of introducing the new program to Fellows and to colleges. The first year was kept small and experimental. Thirty colleges, half of them predominantly Negro institutions, were invited to participate. Fellows were required to have Master's degrees or their equivalent, and to have completed at least two full years of graduate study. Discretionary funds were used to support the Foundation's share of the Interns' salaries. By the mid-summer of 1963, sixteen Wilson Interns were employed at twelve colleges for the academic year 1963-64. They arrived on their campuses in September 1963. No attempt was made to brief the Interns. With few preconceptions about the role Interns should play, the Foundation hoped that his first year would provide its own formulae for the future.

The First Atlanta Conference

The sixteen Interns, several representatives and friends of the Foundation, met in Atlanta in October 1963 for the first of three major assessments of the Internship Program. Astonishing developments were revealed. Interns had developed interdisciplinary honors seminars in cooperation with the faculty of many departments. Two Interns had been made directors of Honors. Others had fitted well into already established Honors Programs. Still others had spent the majority of their time working privately with a few students, sometimes within small non-credit discussion groups joined by other faculty members.

Not all of the Interns' work had gone smoothly, of course. There were the inevitable problems of the beginning teacher. Some Interns were being charged with responsibilities that are normally the prerogative of older, more experienced faculty members. Some colleges felt that Interns should teach lower level courses, and were less interested in their special work with bright students than in using Interns to relieve the heavy teaching burden—often fifteen hours or more—of well-established faculty members. Other difficulties centered around the inadequate preparation college students had received at the high school level. This, together with the tendency of many such students to load their schedules with professional education courses leading to the teaching certificate, made it often difficult, and sometimes impossible, for Interns to stimulate bright students to consider graduate study in the liberal arts.

It was reported at the Atlanta conference that many students had not been able to purchase books that Interns had assigned outside class. Nor could all students afford the expense of Graduate Record Examinations or of applying to several graduate schools at once. The Foundation decided to give each Intern a $100 allowance, in order to help alleviate these problems. The Foundation also decided to assist Interns in small individual projects for which college funds were not normally available. In this way over the year, the Foundation supported book fairs, foreign film festivals, and cultural trips for honor students.

The Conference revealed that Interns could play a genuine role in the colleges' counselling and nominating process. The Foundation wrote two hundred graduate school Deans to inquire what their financial resources were for assistance to students from predominantly Negro colleges. Among other things, the Deans were asked whether they would give weight to letters of recommendation from Wilson Interns. Their replies were encouraging and these were compiled and sent to all Interns. During the year Interns also helped identify future candidates for Wilson Fellowships, and nominated some of the 72 scholars for the Southern Education Foundation's summer study program.

Expansion for 1964-65

As a result of the Interns' reports on the program in October, the Foundation planned a major expansion for 1964-65. Mr. John L. Watkins became the program's director in November 1963 and spent the next two months traveling to colleges likely to participate another year. Dr. Sidney S. Spivack served as special consultant on State Universities. In December 1963, the Rockefeller Foundation made a grant of $405,000 to the Internship Program. It was to be spent over a period of three years and allowed the Foundation to plan for eighty Wilson Interns a year at forty or more colleges, most of them the predominantly Negro institutions.

The financial arrangements between the colleges and the Foundation would remain simple. After Interns had been recommended by the Foundation, all negotiations were to be conducted entirely between the Interns and their colleges. Once an Intern had been employed, the colleges reported his or her salary to the Foundation, which in turn sent the Intern each month a check equivalent to one third of his monthly salary. For 1964, this proportion would be changed to one-fourth; and colleges were required to pay Interns a minimum of $4,500. With the exception of one Intern, whose salary did not meet that figure, all the first year's Interns reported that their finances were in good condition at the end of the year. Many, in fact, reported that they were able to save. As colleges began to employ Interns for 1964-65, salaries ranged from $4,500 to $8,000, and the average became $5,500 for the year.

The Second Atlanta Conference

At a second conference of Interns held in Atlanta in February 1964, several new insights were gained. It became clear that every participating college would have to be treated individually; each Intern would be left alone to develop a special usefulness to the institution he served. Interns would not, in other words, become technicians instructed to perform specific tasks. Secondly, in spite of some concern for continuity, the Foundation would not urge Interns to institutionalize their efforts to encourage bright students, unless the colleges themselves were able to contemplate the extra expense and time necessary for the development of honors programs. More than anything else, Interns were to be viewed as teachers concerned primarily with developing the close and individual relationship to promising students that could produce graduate students in the future.

It also became evident that Interns could be useful to the regular faculty of the college in their efforts to motivate superior students. Interns could use their released time for projects that many faculty members would have liked to develop had they had the time to do so. The success of Interns' work would thus depend in large measure upon the good counsel, recommendations, and advice of regular faculty members, as well as upon their deeper knowledge of the campus.

What form Interns' efforts took would depend upon the stage the college had reached in its development of an honors environment for bright students. Colleges that had honors programs would use Interns to teach already established honors courses. Colleges that were ready to begin developing honors seminars could use Interns for trial efforts in that direction. And finally, there would be several colleges that would find Interns most useful for individual work with bright students for whom no formal honors offerings were available.

Negotiations for 1964-65

Throughout the spring of 1964, Mr. Watkins brought 170 Wilson Fellows in contact with colleges that had requested teachers to fill specific needs. By mid-summer, 50 Wilson Interns had been hired by twenty-nine predominantly Negro and four white institutions for the academic year 1964-65. Fifteen Interns expected to receive doctorates by the end of the year; 20 Interns were married, several with wives or husbands who expected to teach at the same institution.

This was a smaller program than had been anticipated. Several unexpected problems had arisen. Over one hundred prospective Interns withdrew from the program in April and May because of the slow progress of their negotiations with colleges to which they had been recommended. Many such colleges were not able to accelerate their schedule of making appointments before the prospective Interns, a third of whom held the doctorate, accepted offers from other institutions. The participation of white institutions was less than anticipated due to the preference of most Fellows for employment in a predominantly Negro college. Finally, the Negro state institutions in Florida, South Carolina, Alabama and Mississippi were unable to participate in the program due to state policies forbidding the employment of white faculty members.

The Third Conference of Wilson Interns

A third conference of the 1963-64 program took place in New Orleans in June 1964 and provided the Foundation with an opportunity to assess the year. Success in the motivation of bright students would be impossible to measure, except in the rare instances where contact with seniors produced new graduate students the following fall. Moreover, it remained difficult to motivate for graduate study Negro students who had rarely seen or heard of Negro college teachers outside Negro institutions. Yet the stimulation that Interns could give was clearly valuable for individual students who would otherwise have failed to consider graduate school and college teaching as possibilities. Still more needed to be done to make these alternatives real to the student.

Pleasing evidence of the value of an Internship for Wilson Fellows was revealed when half of the first year's Fellows decided to spend a second year at their colleges. Even those who returned to graduate school were enthusiastic about their first teaching and counselling experience. All did feel that greater preparation for their Internship would have helped them be more immediately effective in the first months of the program. Consequently, an effort was made to bring Wilson Interns for 1964-65 in contact with Mr. Watkins, or with one of the previous year's Interns, during the summer.

The brief reports of Interns at the New Orleans conference have shown that colleges value the released time aspect of the Internship Program. They have in fact given Interns major roles in the development of their honors programs. In several cases, Interns were the catalysts for initial honors efforts, and all but one college desired more Interns for 1964-65.

Perhaps the most important characteristic of the program remains its flexibility. The colleges participating in the program continue to vary greatly in the strength and development of their liberal arts and honors programs.

EXCERPTS FROM INTERNS' LETTERS 1963

". . . Wonder of wonders, I've got 12 history students who'll be going to some sort of graduate school next year and hadn't planned to previously! . . . sure we're no gods, no great scholars, no great teachers even (yet) but not every small southern college can get the publicity and charity resulting from a TIME article! For me, it's the most rewarding year; and my love for teaching, confidence in my ability, and satisfaction with a school less well-endowed than those I've attended, have all been reinforced."

Robert Lafleur

"It is logical to assume that first year teachers cannot possibly accomplish those things which older and more experienced faculty members have been unable to accomplish for years . . . (yet) the youth and inexperience of the Interns actually work for them rather than against them. To borrow a phrase from Henry James, we Interns come to our new posts with a 'fresh eye.' This 'fresh eye' serves us favorably in any number of ways."

Susan A. Gohlman

"Alpha Kappa Sigma, as it is officially known, includes seventeen freshmen and three faculty members. I happen to be the only faculty member who regularly attends and guides the meetings. We have met five times, on the campus or in a faculty home, and have discussed the following:

William Shakespeare's Julius Caesar
John Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath
Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman
Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man
William Golding's Lord of the Flies

"We hope soon to meet to discuss two or three Greek tragedies, and a collection of the essays of James Baldwin. .

"I am enclosing a list of the films on the program which we, with support from the Foundation, have planned for this year. For the films already shown, the audience has been from 200 to 300 people. We have been able to draw upon the support and the participation of some people from the University of Alabama, both faculty members and students, and will, in May, be integrating the local Negro movie theater with our final presentation, 'Black Orpheus' and 'The Red Balloon'."

William Chace

> "I did not assume that Negro colleges are staffed by persons who are uniformly incompetent, I did not expect to produce any instant fellowship candidates of any kind, I'm well aware that I'm a novice teacher, and hope that I haven't taken a cavalier attitude toward anyone."

George E. Langer

"Yet it seems likely that the Foundation recognizes the disparity in academic levels of the several participating colleges and also the hazards involved in giving too free rein to men who lack familiarity with local problems.

"In chemistry there should be some sort of original inquiry associated with the honors work and I have been thinking of building a distinct honors group from the top three or four seniors and encouraging them to tackle a modest research proposition around existing laboratory equipment or to go after some theoretical problem if they are so inclined. Also, it might be useful to start a seminar around this core group, including myself, for the discussion of current topics of interest in chemistry. If I had the time I would pursue the possibility of small groups visiting laboratories where really interesting work is underway so that the young men might get a better idea about their level in relation to the level of others."

Joseph N. Gayles, Jr.

"If indeed we Interns had Messiah complexes when we undertook our jobs, we probably were 'quixotic.' I don't think I personally ever had any illusions as to who was doing whom a favor when Bennett allowed me to teach its students; but if I did, they were quickly dispelled by my struggles to impart a decent quantity of knowledge to all those girls sitting before me. Oh, how I have cursed my fumblings, inadequacies, and downright errors! And how often I long for another chance to teach the same courses and do the job better!

". . . the administration seems to think that my value lies in . . . providing a fresh viewpoint on some of the old issues and perhaps even a few really new ideas based on my completely different background."

Judith Rich O'Fallon

"How much, if any, one should consider cultural deprivation when evaluating students is a question that should make any conscientious teacher an insomniac.

"Another side of the 'success story' is that too many teachers . . . do not feel the need for extra effort on their parts as well as the students . . .

"Perhaps, an intern's own example is the best way to convince others to help out."

William J. Whitacre

"What the students need is a good dose of what the Greeks called hybris—something that will lift them out of their state of sluggish submission and give them the feeling that they, and not the gods or the whites, are in control . . ."

* * *

"The spontaneity and joy that (the students) display in discovering something new is quite a refreshing change from the restrained, sophisticated atmosphere of the Northern classroom where the students seem to soft-pedal their delight at hearing something new for fear of appearing naive to their fellow students."

Susan A. Gohlman

"There is no way to conveniently summarize the most profound experience of my life. One relative old-timer from Columbia suggested that six months as an Intern provides accumulated experiences equivalent to six years of 'normal' teaching duties. I can only say in sum that the challenges have been stimulating, the frustrations galling, and the rewards very great indeed."

FOREWORD

Americans are America's greatest resources. From the nation's first settlers, Americans have made untold contributions to the social, technological, scientific and economic advances of not only their own country, but also the world.

To assure this nation that it continues to receive maximum benefit from its human resources, all Americans must be given the opportunity to contribute their talents and abilities.

The Association of Huntsville Area Contractors believes that all people within the Huntsville area should be accorded the opportunity to contribute to the progress of their community, as well as their country.

It was with this belief that industrialists and businessmen within Huntsville's missile and space complex organized the Association one year ago. With a membership of 32 firms, the Association is committed to a program designed to implement the concept of equal opportunity for every individual to develop his full potential through personal merit and performance, without regard to race, color or religion.

During the past 12 months our Association has engaged in programs which we believe are measurably changing the Huntsville community for the better. We submit in this volume a report of these activities.

We know we have only begun and have no illusions about the task before us. We have accepted the challenge, however, of the responsibilities our community status demands of us.

Respectfully submitted,

Milton K. Cummings

Dear Mr. Cummings:

On the occasion of this first of many anniversaries of the Association of Huntsville Area Contractors, I would appreciate it if you would convey to all of the members my heartiest congratulations.

Your organization is fulfilling an important role. It is, we hope and believe, the forerunner of other such contractors' associations in local communities throughout the country. This kind of effort on the part of contractors is one of the best instruments by which they can achieve the objectives of the equal employment opportunity program.

In this first year you have not only become solidly established as an organization, but have also produced very creditable results through your programs.

I am confident that the Association of Huntsville Area Contractors will now go on from the fine start it now has to make a truly outstanding contribution toward our common objective of fully utilizing the talents and abilities of all our citizens.

Sincerely,

Hobart Taylor, Jr.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 88th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Vol. 110 WASHINGTON, THURSDAY, JANUARY 30, 1964 No. 16

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am particularly pleased that NASA has accepted in substance my suggestion that some indication be made for the benefit of NASA employees as to those public accommodations which are or are not available to all regardless of color. I hope that other civilian departments and agencies will take note of this development, which had its beginning in the Defense Department's longstanding practice of posting off limits establishments for the information of both civilian and military personnel. I commend highly NASA's initiative in creating the Huntsville Contractors' Equal Employment Opportunity Association, a kind of local businessmen's committee which I have long urged as an important element in developing community understanding and acceptance of equal treatment under the Constitution.

AHAC has been recognized in the nation's Capitol.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY FOR ALL

The Association of Huntsville Area Contractors (AHAC) is one year old. Formally organized September 5, 1963, the Association is comprised of 32 private industries within Huntsville's gigantic missile and space complex, and is committed to the advancement of equal opportunities for all individuals.

Primarily concerned with the assurance of equal employment opportunities, AHAC is also involved in such community activities as education, housing, public facilities and community relations. Equality of opportunity in these areas, the Association holds, is as much a part of equal employment opportunity as the availability of jobs.

The formation of AHAC was first proposed July 5, 1963, at a meeting of Huntsville industrialists and businessmen desiring to assure Negroes and other minorities an equal chance for employment within the community's space and missile industry. As far as can be determined, the Association represents private industry's first joint effort to provide leadership in the achievement of equal opportunities at the community level.

The Association recognizes that it is but one part of a broad program to effect equality in employment, education, housing and public facilities in Huntsville. Each member firm is pledged to place its influence and resources behind AHAC's endeavor to give leadership and cooperation to Federal, state and local governmental agencies, as well as public and private community agencies, seeking constructive goals in these areas.

AHAC'S FIRST YEAR

The Association has achieved significant progress in its first year of operation. While this progress cannot always be measured by statistics, the Association believes that it has been somewhat successful in reversing trends, motivating people, reorienting attitudes and rendering assistance to members of the minority race.

It has been necessary for the Association to lay certain ground work during its first year, particularly to gain the confidence of both whites and Negroes in the organization's programs and goals, and to create the proper community climate.

The Association cannot take full credit, though its members would like to feel that AHAC played a small part in bringing about the positive attitude with which Huntsville has accepted racial desegregation.

A job survey among member firms and the establishment of on-the-job training, summer hire, and co-op programs are opening new inroads in employment for minorities.

Upgrading of educational opportunities for minorities, though, appears to be a vital key to continued employment opportunities. In education, the Association, as well as individual member firms, have established definite programs, grants and classes to assist the community's colleges and public schools.

To alleviate problems in housing, Association representatives have met with FHA officials, held conferences with local builders, supported neighborhood improvement programs and actually located housing for newcomers.

In other areas, Association members worked with the city's official Biracial Committee and appeared before civic, social, religious and school groups to tell the AHAC story.

The Association's accomplishments and programs in the areas of employment, education, housing, public facilities and community relations are presented in the following pages.

The Association will be the first to admit that its job has only begun. But we are optimistic over our start and look forward to playing a continuing role in the improvement of the Huntsville community for all citizens.

EMPLOYMENT

A survey, made prior to the formation of AHAC, revealed that less than one percent of the more than 25,000 civilian employees of Huntsville's missile and space complex were Negroes. Yet non-white residents comprise 18 percent of the Huntsville area's total population.

To improve this situation without lowering employment standards, the Association has participated in the following activities during its first year of operation:

- Circulation of job information announcements
- Working relationship with major churches and organizations
- Job orientation sessions for prospective employees
- Orientation sessions for school placement officers
- College Placement Officers' Conference
- "Expanding Small College and Federal Inter-Relationships" Conference
- Resume file and referral service for qualified job applicants (see table, page 7)
- Urban League Skill Bank affiliation
- Job development project
- Co-op program for high school students
- Summer hire program (teachers and students)
- Counseling and guidance services
- Public panels regarding equal employment opportunities
- Job and resource survey among member firms
- Promotion of on-the-job training programs

EDUCATION

Members of the minority race holding jobs in Huntsville's missile and space complex include few products of the community's schools and colleges. This indicates to AHAC a need for upgrading the education and training opportunities available to Negroes.

Believing that equality of opportunity in education is the key to equal employment opportunity, the Association is directing a large segment of its total program toward upgrading educational institutions as well as individuals.

HOUSING

It is generally recognized that Negroes have many problems securing adequate housing. Low income is the chief national cause of this limitation. In Huntsville, though, minority residents of substantial means had a problem as late as the Spring of 1964. Housing in predominantly Negro neighborhoods was either inadequate or unavailable, and it was virtually impossible for minorities to move into other areas of the city. Negroes were denied the opportunity to rent many of the vacant apartments or purchase many of the houses offered for sale. Minority engineers, technicians and professional personnel brought in by Army, NASA, industries and the two local colleges were the chief victims of this situation.

Since Huntsville's educational institutions are not yet producing trained persons capable of filling top jobs in the missile and space industry, most of the technical and professional minorities are imported. This means that job offers must be attractive enough to overcome, among other things, the housing factor.

Representatives of Association of Huntsville Area Contractors, including AHAC President and FHA officials from Birmingham, meet with Negro citizens to discuss minority housing problems.

The Association was fully aware of the above considerations in developing its housing program. This program has been aimed toward (1) upgrading the community climate for the acceptance of some of the necessary changes, and (2) encouraging contractors to develop open-occupancy housing projects. The Association's ultimate goal is the achievement of full equality in housing opportunities for minorities.

In its first year the Association engaged in the following projects to bring relief to the local minority housing situation:

- Housing survey needs (member firms)
- Conferences with FHA District, Regional and Washington officials
- Conferences with local Negro citizens
- Conferences with builders
- Location of housing for job recipients
- Human relations conferences to marshall public opinion in support of open-occupancy
- Support of minority community efforts for neighborhood improvement
- Aid and council for problem areas
- Conferences with land owners for possible housing sites
- Friend-in-court to minorities having housing problem resulting from discriminatory practices
- Negotiation and persuasion to expand housing opportunities

A high school student works in AHAC member firm through co-op program the Association sponsors.

PUBLIC FACILITIES

The Association's role in public facilities has been to work toward creating a climate conducive to the changes that accompany the achievement of racial equality.

The chairman of this committee, General John Barclay (Ret.), is also a member of the city's biracial Human Relations Committee, which attempts to work behind the scenes in promoting racial harmony, eliminating discriminatory practices, and smoothing the way for changing patterns in public accomodations and facilities.

Other AHAC activities in this area have included:

- Appearances before Biracial Committee
- Commitment to support of Civil Rights Act
- Support of public school boards' decisions
- Promotion of observance of law and order
- Counciliation conferences
- Promotion of Diversified Occu-
- pations, MDTA, and Huntsville State Vocational Technical School classes
- Promotion of State Employment Services
- Survey of public facilities available to minorities

COMMUNITY RELATIONS

The Association has carried on an extensive community relations program during the past 12 months. This program has included familiarizing both whites and Negroes with AHAC's purposes; working alongside organizations with compatible goals; orientating Negroes about new opportunities available to them; motivating minority citizens to rise above their present status; stressing the value of adequate education and training; and community improvement.

Assuming a great share of responsibility for the community relations program has been the Technical Advisory Committee (TAC), a group of Negro technical and professional personnel who contribute their time to working for the betterment of minorities through action programs at the "grass roots" level. The committee assists Negroes in qualifying for available job opportunities; encourages professional advancement; serves as a clearing house for mutual problems, and furnishes an outlet for social, civic and cultural activities.

The committee concentrates its efforts in the areas of:

- Motivation
- Counseling and guidance
- Community coordination
- Job orientation and employment
- Cultural enrichment
- Housing
- Recreation
- Community orientation
- Continuing education
- Poverty

Other community relations activities in which the Association has engaged are:

- Appearances before civic, social, religious and school groups
- Job development project
- Anti-poverty war
- Commitment to Community Relations Services
- Cooperation with compatible organizations
- Publication of training programs, job openings, and planned activities through news sheet and radio programs
- Cooperation with and coordination of joint programs of implementation with government agencies (including NASA, Army)

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, STAFF

The Association's Executive Director and Secretary operate a fulltime office.

Besides involvement in the many phases of the Association's program, the Executive Director has represented AHAC at local, regional and national conferences and counselled individuals seeking guidance in education, housing, community improvements and other problems.

Open to all persons who desire its services, the office has seen the demands on it mushroom within recent months. Negroes, seeking a central agency for guidance in their problems, are beginning to visit the AHAC office in overwhelming numbers.

The load on the Executive Director and his Secretary became so great during the year that it was necessary for member firms to place personnel "on loan" to the Association.

The Association is proud of the role this office is playing in the community, and will continue to make its services available to those individuals and groups whose aims are compatible to those of AHAC.

Dear Milton:

As you round out your year as President of the Association of Huntsville Area Contractors, I would like to thank and congratulate you for a job well done. Your personal enthusiasm and leadership with the Association have contributed immeasurably to its growth and success in its initial year of operation. We at the Marshall Center, as well as all of our NASA Headquarters, are appreciative of your efforts and the efforts of the member firms of AHAC in helping to make equal employment opportunities for all citizens of our community a reality. Heads of government and military agencies have recognized the value of AHAC to the Huntsville community.

Highlights of AHAC's activities from its formation are portrayed by these excerpts from the Association's official minutes. In addition to regular meetings, the Association's seven-man Executive Committee has devoted considerable time to planning and proposing programs, establishing policies and procedures, and directing financial activities for the organization.

JULY 5, 1963 – Twenty-nine representatives of firms in the Huntsville complex holding government contracts attended a meeting and reacted favorably to a proposal to organize in the interest of acting "in unity with well defined programs of action to improve the percentage of minority employment in the Huntsville complex." The group unanimously adopted eleven points of agreement and action; named Mr. Milton K. Cummings as temporary spokesman and chairman; formed an Organization Committee of R. A. Harrison (IBM), John Hatch (SPACO, Inc.), and A. V. Pilling (Hayes International Corp.); and agreed to adopt an organizational charter and elect permanent officers "at an early date."

AUGUST 5, 1963 – A second meeting included the discussion and organization of the proposed charter; the appointment of a Nominating Committee to propose a slate of officers; discussion of possibly securing a Negro as Executive Director; and the expression of words of encouragement from Col. T. W. Cooke (Commander of AMSC), Mr. Harry Rhett through Chairman M. K. Cummings, M. F. Shortridge (Special Assistant to Labor Relations, Army Missile Command), Col. Allgeier (Coordinator for AMSC), Mr. Marion I. Kent (Assistant to the Deputy of Administration, NASA-MSFC), Mr. Hawks (of Washington office), Rev. Edsel Keith, Mr. Nelms, and Mr. J. E. Harris (Negro civic club).

AUGUST 19, 1963 – The Organization Committee adopted a $35,000 annual budget and an assessment plan for members.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1963 – The Association charter was unanimously adopted; 15 firms were committed to membership; Association of Huntsville Area Contractors was adopted as official name of organization; Mr. Milton K. Cummings was elected President; Mr. A. V. Pilling, Vice President; Mr. Joe Kirk, Treasurer; and Messrs. John Hatch, R. A. Harrison, Harry Wrage, and General John A. Barclay to the Executive Committee.

Acceptance speech by President Cummings pointed up members' challenge to ensure that the Association does a job reflecting credit on the Army Missile Command, Marshall Space Flight Center and Huntsville, as well as the participating firms; he declared that he felt the climate was ripe for their affirmative actions in the interest of improving the plight of minorities in the community.

OCTOBER 3, 1963 – Mr. L. C. McMillan, Registrar and Director of Admissions at Praire View (Texas) A&M College, was hired as Executive Director of the Association. President Cummings reported on his participation in an open meeting sponsored by a local Negro civic organization and his invitation to the group to submit to AHAC their proposals for affirmative actions in the areas of equal employment opportunity, housing, education, etc.; other reports were on professional assistance given to Alabama A&M College to assist in their accreditation efforts, and the tour and challenge given Oakwood College's Board of Trustees.

NOVEMBER 14, 1963 – AHAC adopted by-laws and articles of incorporation; met and heard from its newly appointed Executive Director (effective November 1, 1963); discussed proposals for a final two week membership drive; adopted proposed consultant's list of 50 outstanding Negro community leaders and citizens; heard proposal from Mr. John Bone (Lockheed) for making computer training available to local Negro college staff members and students.

DECEMBER 12, 1963 – Mr. W. B. Starr, Industrial Employment Policy Specialist, Equal Employment Opportunity Office, Southern Region, Army Materiel Command, Forest Park, Georgia, and Mr. E. Vincent Suitt, Chief of the Office of Equal Employment Opportunity (Air Force), Atlanta Contract Management Division, met with the Association. President Cummings announced that Oakwood and Alabama A&M Colleges had been accredited by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, which indicated that their programs were upgraded and that AHAC's past efforts in their behalf were beneficial.

JANUARY 16, 1964 – Mr. John Hatch reported that a new office facility for Association headquarters had been leased at 2205 East University Drive. Mr. Cummings reported that FHA officials from Birmingham had visited Huntsville in an effort to assist in resolving the housing problem for minorities.

FEBRUARY 13, 1964 – Mr. Blaylock reviewed activities of the Education Committee, including promotion of classes in computer education, drafting and secretarial science. Mr. Wrage, chairman of the Housing Committee, told of working with AHAC's Negro Consultants Committee in identifying four desirable sites for FHA-financed middle income housing to prospective builders; looking into needs and possibilities for low cost housing; and cooperating with a newly formed company organized to provide an open-occupancy trailer park. President Cummings reported that deans from Negro colleges were invited for the first time to participate in Huntsville's "Engineering Dean's Day" during Engineering Week.

MARCH 23, 1964 – The Association heard a report from the Technical Advisory Committee (TAC), one of the Association's support units in the area of community relations. The Committee reported that it had identified 160 technical professional and service employees of the minority race in space and missile programs in Huntsville. The Committee reported that it had found that few of these persons were actually in positions which could be classified as "technical," and that few of those who were in such positions were products of local schools or colleges. Mr. Blaylock reported that the Education Committee had met with Dr. D. C. Agnew, Project Director of Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, to seek assistance in establishing an Education Improvement Center in Huntsville.

MAY 7, 1964 – Committee reports were indicative of progress in several areas. Mr. John Hatch, Employment Committee, reported that the committee circulated a list of students and teachers recommended for summer employment; sponsored meeting of minority commercial teachers with officials of the State Employment Department and new commercial schools, and conducted special tutoring classes for drafting students. The Education Committee reported that it met with state education officials regarding proposed programs in critical areas of need; prepared and presented to the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools a preliminary request for establishment of an Education Improvement Center in Huntsville; met with officials of new commercial college relative to local training needs. Mr. Harry Wrage of the Housing Committee said his group assisted a contractor and the Army in finding housing for new employees and established contact with a local minority housing committee in the Pulaski-Cavalry Hill area. The Local Facilities Committee reported that the Human Relations Committee was undertaking new projects to open opportunities for minority participation in such recreational outlets as bowling. Mr. John Bone reported that plans were being made for a summer training program for teachers in computer education.

JUNE 4, 1964 – Mr. G. O. Unrau and Mr. Charles Brandon, who are working on the Pulaski-Cavalry Hill Rehabilitation Study Project, told AHAC members of plans to rehabilitate and improve this neighborhood. This effort blends with the Association's housing program.

JULY 9, 1964 – Mr. Herman Sweatt, Associate Director of the Atlanta office of the Urban League, discussed the operation of the League's Skill Bank and its potential aid to AHAC firms. Permission has been granted by the Urban League office to establish an affiliation with AHAC. General Barclay called attention to the appointment of President Cummings to President Johnson's Community Relations Services Committee and offered motions (unanimously adopted) that Mr. Cummings draft a resolution on behalf of AHAC agreeing to conform with provisions of the Civil Rights Act, and that the Association express its appreciation to Mr. Cummings for his acceptance of the appointment to the President's Committee.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1964 – President Cummings reported on attendance at meeting of Community Relations Services Committee in Washington and conference with Sargent Shriver in regard to a pilot project for Huntsville in the War on Poverty. Mr. G. J. Millet (Brown Engineering Co.), Dr. A. V. Pinkney (President of Oakwood College) and Dr. R. D. Morrison (President of Alabama A&M College) presented panel discussion report of the College Placement Officers Conference in Washington, D. C. The panel agreed that Negro colleges, by and large, lack sufficient funds to develop new courses or programs, but with incentive from industry, these schools can improve their programs.

OCTOBER 8, 1964 – Members unanimously adopted Nominating Committee's proposed 1964-65 slate of officers: Mr. A. V. Pilling, President; Mr. Ruffin Blaylock, Vice President; Mr. W. T. Brooks, Treasurer; Mr. J. O. Schrimsher, Mr. Tom Burkett, Mr. Milton K. Cummings, Mr. Harry Wrage, Executive Committee. Report on the Community Leaders' Conference, attended by 75 persons who presented recommendations for improving the status of the minority, was presented. Members heard encouraging report from Southern Association of Colleges and Schools concerning Education Improvement Center for Huntsville. Dr. Frank Albert and Mr. Howard Blair of MSFC interpreted "Affirmative Action" during a special presentation and discussion. Progress of special classes designed to assist employed persons to gain promotions, unemployed persons to become more proficient in needed skills, and supplement classroom instruction of students was reported.

December 16-19, 1964

* * * * *

The Conference reported herein was performed persuant to a contract with the United States Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Office of Education.

This conference marks the most significant step taken thus far to launch the U.S. Office of Education's Equal Educational Opportunities Program, authorized under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Francis Keppel,
United States Commissioner of Education
December 16, 1964

With this remark, Commissioner Keppel opened a four-day conference held under the auspices of the United States Office of Education and the College of Education of the University of Maryland.[1] The conference was organized to look at the following broad questions:

I. What are the dimensions of the problem of school desegregation which may be the focus of institutes supported by Federal funds under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964?

II. How can some priority be established upon which decisions can be made by the Equal Educational Opportunities Program of the U.S. Office of Education as to which type of institute, which target population, which area of concern--national or local-- might best be served by such Federally-supported institutes? Since the money for such institutes ($3,000,000 for fiscal year 1965 under Section 404 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964) will not spread very far in terms of the vast need, it is hoped that one outcome of the Conference will be advice to the U.S. Office of Education regarding which programs would have the broadest "ripple effect."

III. What is the most appropriate content (knowledge, skills) for such institutes, in terms of what types of participants, at what positions in the school desegregation process?

IV. What designs and processes for such institutes hold particular promise for optimal learning?

V. What strategies are of greatest potential in terms of school change, particularly in an area such as this, fraught with acute community emotion?

VI. What kinds of short-run evaluation and long-run research would be desirable, to help assess current efforts, and to provide some insight into more significant aspects of change within the institutional and community setting?

VII. Finally, what kinds of follow-up conferences, institutes, training programs, and leadership discussions would be recommended to further maximize the impact of institutes?

Conference Background

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 authorized the utilization of funds to further the orderly process of school desegregation through appropriate educational processes. The authorization, Title IV, Public Law 88-352, reads as follows:

TITLE IV--DESEGREGATION OF PUBLIC EDUCATION

Definitions

Sec. 401. As used in this title--

"Commissioner." (a) "Commissioner" means the Commissioner of Education.

"Desegregation." (b) "Desegregation" means the assignment of students to public schools and within such schools without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin, but "desegregation" shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance.

"Public school."

(c) "Public school" means any elementary or secondary educational institution, and "public college" means any institution of higher education or any technical or vocational school above the secondary school level, provided that such public school or public college is operated by a State, subdivision of a State, or governmental agency within a State, or operated wholly or predominantly from or through the use of governmental funds or property, or funds or property derived from a governmental source.

"School board."

(d) "School board" means any agency or agencies which administer a system of one or more public schools and any other agency which is responsible for the assignment of students to or within such a system.

Survey and Report of Educational Opportunities

Report to President and Congress.

Sec. 402. The Commissioner shall conduct a survey and make a report to the President and the Congress, within two years of the enactment of this title, concerning the lack of availability of equal educational opportunities for individuals by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin in public educational institutions at all levels in the United States, its territories and possessions, and the District of Columbia.

Technical Assistance

Sec. 403. The Commissioner is authorized, upon the application of any school board, State, municipality, school district, or other governmental unit legally responsible for operating a public school or schools, to render technical assistance to such applicant in the preparation, adoption, and implementation of plans for the desegregation of public schools. Such technical assistance may, among other activities, include making available to such agencies information regarding effective methods of coping with special educational problems occasioned by desegregation, and making available to such agencies personnel of the Office of Education or other persons specially equipped to advise and assist them in coping with such problems.

Training Institutes

Sec. 404. The Commissioner is authorized to arrange, through grants or contracts, with institutions of higher education for the operation of short-term or regular session institutes for special training designed to improve the ability of teachers, supervisors, counselors, and other elementary or secondary school personnel to deal effectively with special educational problems occasioned by desegregation. Individuals who attend such an institute on a full-time basis may be paid stipends for the period of their attendance at such institute in amounts specified by the Commissioner in regulations, including allowances for travel to attend such institute.

Grants

Sec. 405. (a) The Commissioner is authorized, upon application of a school board, to make grants to such board to pay, in whole or in part, the cost of--

(1) giving to teachers and other school personnel in-service training in dealing with problems incident to desegregation, and

(2) employing specialists to advise in problems incident to desegregation.

Conditions.

(b) In determining whether to make a grant, and in fixing the amount thereof and the terms and conditions on which it will be made, the Commissioner shall take into consideration the amount available for grants under this section and the other applications which are pending before him; the financial condition of the applicant and the other resources available to it; the nature, extent, and gravity of its problems incident to desegregation; and such other factors as he finds relevant.

The funds to carry out these functions were made available several months after the passage of the law, and the task of assembling a staff was commenced. At the same time, a number of interested institutions and individuals were already making inquiries of the U.S. Office of Education regarding the establishment of summer institutes under Section 404 above. It became increasingly clear that, as noted in item II outlining the purposes of the University of Maryland conference, that the need was tremendous, but the financial assistance available could not possibly extend very far during the first year of operation.

It was clear to the U.S. Office of Education, therefore, that given the complexity of the training problems related to desegregation and the limited funds available, the counsel of competent advisers should be sought in developing the institutes program. In turn, of course, many legal questions had to be studied by the Office of General Counsel, U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and some general procedural matters worked out for the new program. Under extreme pressure of time, the staff was able to clear most of the legal problems, and circularize a preliminary set of guidelines for those interested in applying under the provisions of the Act.

Many questions remained unanswered, however. Meetings and consultations had been taking place over a period of 18 months, but it was hoped that by gathering a group of specialists in education, school administration, behavioral science, and community intergroup organization, many issues could be clarified and problems explored, and thus aid the program in moving ahead rapidly on the basis of expert advice and experience.

The conference at no time was considered to be a policy-making or policy-determining group. No votes were taken. Where consensus was apparent it was always with the caveat that those not present might enter other points of view for consideration. This report, therefore, reflects the varied opinions, experiences, and hopes of about 55 individuals representing many fields, many regions, many disciplines, and a variety of institutions, school systems, and community organizations.

Several points were made over and over again by the participants. They are essential to an understanding of this report, and will be repeated again at the conclusion of this report in order that there be as few grounds for misunderstanding as possible.

The kinds of institutes or institute programs which were envisioned covered a vast range. If one word could be used to characterize the ideas held by the participants it would be "variety." It was equally clear that no participant, despite the fact that many had lifetime careers in the organizing and directing of institutes for teachers and other educators, would suggest that his type of institute would be applicable in all and every case. Again, then, the emphasis on "variety" was augmented by the concept of "appropriate." These ideas will be spelled out in further detail in later sections of this report.

The following report is a very brief summary of the major ideas of the conference participants. The report is to be considered in no way as a strait jacket for institute proposals. In fact, the very opposite is the intent of this report. As will be stated again later, a number of institutions may wish to plan and organize very similar types of institutes because of the similarity of their situation. Other institutions may wish to experiment, innovate, and utilize training techniques adapted from industry, and elsewhere.

The report will consider briefly those items listed on pages 1 and 2 which provided the basic framework around which the conference was organized.

I. What are the dimensions of the school desegregation problem as defined by Title IV?

As the reader will note, Section 402 of the Civil Rights Act calls for a survey of the "lack of equal educational opportunity." This survey will undoubtedly help answer some of the key questions raised by the conference, but unfortunately the findings of the survey are at least 18 months away. Each participant was therefore asked to state the problem as he saw it. The diversity of backgrounds and experiences provided, as one would expect, a diversity of responses. What came out most clearly was that different regions as well as different communities within regions are at different stages in the achievement of equal educational opportunity regardless of race.

Some areas are totally resistant; here the problem of even suggesting that an institute be held would be rejected by the white community. It is probably that here, too, the Negro community would be unable to participate because of possible reprisal. Other communities, although many white voices express resistance, are willing to accede to the letter of the law, if not the spirit, and thus have already indicated a willingness to cooperate in some kind of preparatory training program. In some localities this mutual interest in utilizing the available Federal assistance has already resulted in colleges and universities and adjacent school districts discussing together the establishment of institutes in the very near future.

There was some agreement that larger cities in areas where segregation by law has been enforced might be places where cooperative activities could occur soonest. The problem of definition--"when is a school system desegregated?"--arose, but the general response appeared to be that so-called token desegregation was not what the Civil Rights Law referred to. Institutes therefore would be quite as appropriate to assist school systems in which no integration had taken place at all, as in situations where one or two "mascot" Negroes had been enrolled in previously all white schools. It was clear, too, that even in school systems where complete desegregation had been achieved, many educational problems might still remain unsolved and critical. Such problems as variation in educational achievement, for instance, among different segments of the community could present a pressing training problem for teachers.

Throughout the discussion of the individual participant's statements it was clear that desegregation is occurring as part of a much larger pattern of social change. However, it was also agreed that this larger pattern was not within the purview of the Title IV provision. But within its sections, educational personnel could and indeed should accept leadership in educational desegregation.

The group was reminded, too, that many cities which had desegregated had, over the space of a decade, become in effect resegregated. This would be the problem of another generation of educators if today's educator ignored or evaded this potential problem. The kinds of institutes--the content explored, the processes and designs developed--could be effective in much more long-range terms if appropriately foreseen, now.

The participants listed many problems which might arise. Among these were:

- development or use of new curriculum materials, content, and approaches helpful in meeting instructional problems of disadvantaged groups.
- planning procedures for the conduct of extra-curricular activities in situations involving students from different backgrounds.
- establishing plans and policies for the assignment of administrative and teaching staff as an integral part of school desegregation.
- development of understanding of different value and behavior systems and the appropriate educational and psychological response.
- extending diagnostic skills to identify areas for special educational effort to meet individual differences in educational attainment.

Other items mentioned included: recruitment of white and Negro school personnel for integrated institutes; convincing some school systems and school personnel that there was any problem in connection with desegregation; obtaining appropriate resource leadership and materials for institute participants; difficulties foreseen in community hostility, apathy, or lack of involvement; the impact of track or grouping practices; the use or misuse of test results; and the need for new approaches in pre-service teacher education.

Space precludes a complete listing of the problems identified by the participants. Many will be considered in other sections of this report.

The dimensions of the problem were, indeed, difficult to assess. The map could not be accurately filled in. We are still too ignorant, and perhaps too provincial, seeing our own area or region or field of specialization. It was considered highly important, therefore, that there be continued communication among those actively involved in implementing Title IV. The problem evaded precise description also because it involved not only the politics but the psychology of change, areas again in which scholars and educational practitioners have not generally shared each others understandings.

II. On what basis can priorities be established for the support of institutes under Section 404 of the Civil Rights Act?

The conference addressed itself to this extremely difficult problem throughout one day, meeting in large session with spokesmen presenting varying points of view and then meeting in smaller groups to come to grips with the practical problems of priority determination.

As has been stated, the conference was not asked to and did not expect to--in fact did not want to--establish hard and fast guidelines. Certain large themes emerged, however, which gained at least general approval.

1. It was felt that where several institutions of higher learning could jointly plan with adjacent interested school districts, an institute might have a better chance of achieving its goal. With this general agreement there was the stated belief of several that the institutions of higher learning involved might most appropriately be both Negro and white if the locality is one in which such institutions remain, to all intents, predominantly of one race.

It was further felt to be valuable if the institute planning included consideration of appropriate follow-up assistance available under Sections 403 and 405. Previous workshop directors who were among the conference participants noted that much good has been done in other kinds of workshops, but lacking any machinery for follow-up support for individual teachers or administrators, the workshop experience may have only produced individual frustration. Again and again it was repeated by conference participants that institute experiences, while valuable in and of themselves, would not have the desired impact if follow-up plans were not considered an integral part of total institute planning The inference here was that those institutions of higher learning responsible for organizing and applying for the institutes, would include at all planning levels key school personnel from the school systems in which follow-up activities would be desirable. Again, too, the point was stressed that such school planning personnel include spokesmen for both Negro and white segments of the school districts. If all school superintendents in the country were to meet, it is probable that out of the many thousands, only one or two might be Negro. Thus the planning involving desegregation, in order that it not appear to be planning by white school personnel for Negro school personnel, will need careful consideration by those responsible for requesting and planning institutes.

2. The personnel who would be recruited for institutes could be of several kinds. That is, an institute might be designed wholly for school board members to meet with specially trained legal counsel; or school board members with school administrators of communities where desegregation has been successfully achieved. There might be institutes in which, for example, primary grade teachers only would be involved, whose major focus might be on the learning needs of pupils different from those whom she is used to instructing. This of course would apply equally to white as well as Negro teachers. Similarly, an institute for counselors with the appropriate employment and vocational personnel of an area, with testing experts and others, could be helpful.

Since the act refers to "school personnel" as those to be served by institutes, conference participants agreed that this was a wide net. School nurses, for instance, might profit from a mutual exhange of problems; school bus drivers might benefit from interracial training sessions. It was pointed out that many professional personnel are already affiliated with organizations which represent their major professional interests--band directors, coaches, social studies teachers, remedial reading teachers, vocational education teachers, school supervisors, art teachers, and so forth. There are a number of honorary sororities and fraternities in professional education, as well as state and local teachers and administrators groups. It was suggested that these organizations might also join forces with local colleges or universities in assisting in the planning and recruiting of personnel for specialized institutes. Such organizations could of course utilize their own local, state, and national meetings to help their membership develop appropriate skills and understandings for orderly school desegregation, as appropriate. Institutes, therefore, could be designed to serve a specialized group in the school organization.

There were repeated requests also for institutes to which teams of school personnel from a given school or system would be enrolled. It was felt that such persons, sharing a common experience, could support each other back home. The resources of the institutes could be used for making more realistic plans for back home application. The team idea is indeed a most attractive one. Sociologically, some warnings might be observed before too hasty decision on this particular point is reached. A team which includes personnel of differing status relationships may suggest a different design for a workshop. If, for example, a principal is present with a teacher, counselor, perhaps school board member, then all could participate in some general activities. But there might be need for special small group activities for each of the different team members in terms of his or her own area of specialty. It must also be noted that some team members might be selected by local personnel because they were seen as effective barriers to desegregation and invulnerable to institute programs or were so low on the status ladder that any convictions or plans they might bring home could be successfully ignored. The suggestion then in terms of priority and selection of personnel for an institute would depend to a large extent on the perceptive planning of the institute director together with his advisory group from his own institution, from the related school systems, and from the U.S. Office of Education as requested.

It probably need not be pointed out, but it was obvious that all institutes would be interracial in planning, in recruitment, in staffing and in all follow-up plans.

3. Although there was concern that the conference might founder on the big-city resergregated school district as against the never-desegregated system, this discussion, while keen, did not pose particularly critical problems to this particular conference group. It was agreed, however, that although areas in the South where the problems are at the moment most severe, where compliance has been most difficult, might well request and need assistance most; it was also agreed that acute problems of desegregation exist in other parts of the country, and merit consideration and assistance.

4. There were some serious questions raised regarding the role of some major universities in such institutes. It was agreed that they had superior staff resources in many areas, but it was also pointed out that many of them had already acquired a lion's share of project support from many sources,

Federal and otherwise. The idea was suggested that, granted the shortage of trained personnel, institutes developed by the larger universities and their experienced teaching personnel could perhaps be made available to another region of the country where the need might be greater. There was some feeling that benefits would be derived for all concerned. While not underestimating the problems of school segregation which exist in so many parts of the nation, it was at least hoped that some major Eastern or Western university could experiment with teaming its institute staff with the staff of a college or university in an area of critical need elsewhere. It was also pointed out, however, that there might be distinct advantages to be gained by school personnel attending institutes in otner sections of the country where they might observe practices which could provide models for back home procedures.

Some critical comments were voiced regarding the inappropriateness of inter-institution rivalry in the pursuit of grants for institutes under the Civil Rights Act. The need, obviously, is too urgent and the problem too significant for any institution to consider requesting an institute for mere status reasons. In this respect, some of the smaller liberal arts, non-public institutions might provide a particular kind of local setting as well as freedom from some kinds of public restrictions which would suggest encouraging such institutions to develop institute plans.

5. A priority high on the list was the need for locating resource personnel not only to aid in the staffing of institutes, but to provide the desired follow-up training and guidance. The staff of the Equal Educational Opportunities Program in the U.S. Office of Education has agreed to compile a list of resource personnel on as wide a base as possible. Institute planners are urged to utilize this service as necessary, and conference participants and others were also asked to contribute names of persons who might be helpful. There was agreement, however, that such personnel were in extremely short supply, and obviously could not serve all those requesting such service. There was a feeling that college faculties might themselves be attached to some institutes as trainees so that they could return to their home institutions and provide local leadership.

This particular point was re-emphasized in other contexts, but suggests a priority that is of great significance. In this sensitive area of social change, local defensiveness is apt to rise particularly on the part of the white power group. Thus the development of local talent, Negro and white, adequately trained, might constitute a significant aspect of strategy in promoting orderly desegregation.

III. What content, skills, knowledges are most appropriate for such institutes?

The question, as phrased, obviously covered far too much territory. As was pointed out, the selection of content had to be closely related to the participant group. It was also agreed that content and process cannot be separated, though for the purposes of discussion the major focus of one session was on the content question.

In one instance an institute might be designed for primary grade teachers, and the content therefore might well be directed at those questions which would be of greatest concern to this group. If the institute called together superintendents of medium-sized cities, then again the content might be rather different.

Several recurrent themes however, were stressed.

1. It appeared essential that there be understanding of the total community which the institute was operating to serve. If several school systems and two or three colleges and universities joined forces to sponsor an institute, then it was pointed out that knowledge of the total community in which the schools were operating would be of great concern. Within this general content area, reference was made to the fact that the white community in many instances is quite unaware of the power structure of the Negro community. Too often the leading ministers, a few Negro educators, maybe a prosperous businessman, are considered the key figures in the Negro group. As was made clear, this may be far from the case. Obviously the sentiments, fears, ambitions and wishes of the Negro community need to be accurately assessed as part of the content of an institute concerned with school desegregation.

2. No matter what the clientele of an institute, it was pointed out that almost all of us, Negro and white alike, need to be re-educated when it comes to the myths and historical gaps in our knowledge about the Negro, his antecedents, his role in the American story, and his actual and potential achievement. Removing some of these misconceptions among adults, who in turn could help clarify the views and understandings of children,could pave the way for more amicable resolutions of conflicts. That some of these myths are deeply rooted in our subconscious was made graphic by one of the participants, a psychiatrist, who had, in working with future doctors, identified the same level of folk acceptance of racial differences in this supposedly scientifically trained group that exists in the public at large. The need for such re-education, therefore, appears to suggest a large area of content for appropriate institutes.

3. Stress was placed on the need to gather and utilize the findings of behavioral sciences as they apply to the manifold and complex problems of school desegregation. There is scholarly research which must be tapped in political science, anthropology, social psychology, psychiatry, sociology, and related interdisciplinary fields such as group dynamics, communications, etc. The insights of specialists in these many fields have until now not been extensively called upon by educators. Yet one could conceive of few problems now faced by the educational profession which could more appropriately make use of the findings from these fields, as well as using the services of the scholars themselves. It was noted that many scholars whose research may be quite relevant are not always able to translate the application of their research to the action level. It is possible that in some future time institutes for behavioral scientists might well be called; institutes in which these behavioral scientists are provided opportunities to identify the applicability of their knowledges to the action needs of school desegregation.

4. The new skills which may be needed for a group embarking on school desegregation were discussed, but opened such a vast area of inquiry that only brief mention could be made of what is possible. Such skills as role-playing; incident control; action research; participant-observer sensitivity; identifying overt vs. covert communication: all of these imply new ways of behaving and new skills to be learned. In the design of institutes, those skills most needed by the given group must be assessed. The participants themselves may be the least competent to identify those skills which they may most need to acquire.

5. At a very practical level, the content of many institutes would, said the conference participants, appropriately include case studies of desegregation situations which worked amicably, and those in which difficulty was encountered. In many places, it was felt, information about successful school desegregation has not been widely disseminated.

6. Two levels of content were discussed: the level of information received, which in turn the individual uses either in transmitting to someone else (as in the case of teachers in a classroom) or translating into policy (as in the case of administrators and school board members). A second level of content had to do with the kind of information, if one can use that word, which provides the individual an opportunity to gain knowledge about himself. It was felt by some participants that inability to understand the workings of one's own emotional and irrational areas of life tends to interfere with the individual's ability to hear or observe anything which may interfere with this internal frame of reference, unrelated as it may be to reality. To what extent some institutes may deem it appropriate or useful to explore this content area depends, of course, on the competence of the director, the participants involved, and the resource personnel who will be available.

It was pointed out, however, that no matter how much we may appear to be working on level one type content, as noted above, inevitably we will be invading level two type content. A director of an institute who is unaware of this may find not only minimal outcomes from his efforts, but even rejection and regression. Clear to everyone was the inescapable fact that the problem of race in America has roots deep in irrationality, and desegregation inevitably will trigger such irrationality in even the most well-meaning and well-educated individuals, both white and Negro.

7. Emphasis was placed again and again on the concept of "readiness." The selection of institute content will have to relate, ultimately, to the readiness of the participants. The determination of such readiness in itself poses problems for institute directors. He must listen to many voices and see through many eyes. The help of behavioral scientists skilled in this kind of assessment could possible be very useful. Even the term "readiness" will have different meanings for different groups. Teachers who are deeply committed to doing the best job of teaching they can, may readily accept a call to an interracial institute to learn better how to teach primary grade reading, for example. This then becomes their point of "readiness." Another group of school personnel, such as school supervisors, may be concerned with the ways in which classroom atmosphere effects self-concept and in turn influences achievement levels. The "readiness" of this group, then, for another kind of content, is obvious.

It must be pointed out, again, however, that what may appear on the surface to be the individual's own perception of his "readiness," may indeed be only the beginning of his awareness of his own needs to grow and learn. Thus the institute, in its planning, as it considers starting where the participants appear to be, must continually appraise where they are going, and change content and design as the group grows in new insights and learnings.

IV. What designs and processes for proposed institutes hold particular promise for optimal learnings?

The literature on how adults learn, or relearn, has not been generally available to the educational groups planning institutes for other educators. It was noted, however, that research in such areas is scanty and nonconclusive. The major points in institute planning, taking into consideration both design and process appeared to be these:

1. An institute needs extensive data about those who are participants. Too often institutes are planned without enough thought given to those who will come. What are their expectations? Do they expect lectures? Entertainment? Depth psychology? Exchange of skill? Sharing of materials?

What previous inter-racial experiences have the participants had, and how have these experiences affected their perceptions of the problems to be dealt with? What variation in such experiences exists among the participants in a workshop? If, for instance, some school personnel have had little or no inter-racial experience, while others have had many pleasant such experiences, the sharing of insights gained can be very supportive.

2. Some educators appear to be allergic to anything which sounds like "group dynamics" or "group process." If this is so, then the labels for such procedures may need to be changed. Many of the basic principles of such procedures, however, have been validated by intensive research. Industrial organizations, whose main interest is profit, seem to find "group dynamics" in its various forms and manifestations, to make a considerable contribution to their goals. Why educators are so distrustful of approaches of this sort remains an unanswered question.

3. Whatever the duration of an institute, be it three days or once a month for a year, planning should take into account a deliberate sequence of experiences. What is now known about how adults learn can well be applied to the organization, the "design" of an institute experience. Many institutes and workshops for teachers have followed a standard pattern of morning lectures, presentations or programs, followed by afternoon smaller group activity on some kind of project, interspersed with field trips, picnics or other diversions. Such a pattern, while agreeable to participants and relatively easy to plan on the part of institute directors, has not always resulted in noticeable increments of behavioral change back home. There was some agreement that more creative and more sophisticated institute designs needed to be sought. This did not imply, however, that the kind of format to which teachers and others are acclimated should not be utilized where their personnel make-up, might preclude innovating on too many fronts.

4. It was apparent that some of the more interesting and possibly more effective institute or workshop patterns were relatively unknown. The extensive citywide involvement via open-ended television, pioneered by Dr. Eugene Johnson, for instance, in St. Louis, was news to many conference participants who had for years been in the midst of institute and workshop activities. The need to exchange such experiences as well as evaluate those which had taken place was clearly apparent.

5. Some discussion pointed out the differential learnings that might be expected from short-term intensive live-in workshops, as against longer, commuter-type workshops. There are understandably places where an inter-racial residential experience might, at this juncture, be impossible. By and large, however, it was felt that the gains to be achieved by these very important informal relationships are such that the live-in institute can be strongly recommended.

6. In planning both the process and content aspects of an institute, there was general agreement that the findings of the behavioral sciences must be utilized. Not only should such data be available to participants, but scholars representing a number of disciplines could aid in planning and staffing institutes. For instance, if a psychiatrist were to advance his view of the expected responses of young children in a newly desegregated situation, a sociologist and an anthropologist might well be asked to comment upon his observations. The problem would gain greater illumination via this kind of inter-disciplinary exchange.

V. What strategies are of greatest potential in terms of school change, in an area such as this fraught with acute community emotion?

Schools change relatively less drastically than some observers might either note or wish. The times, however, appear to be propitious for some significant changes in the structure of the school and in the deployment of teacher personnel. The value of viewing some successful innovations which may support school desegregation was suggested.

The problem of strategy, however, is a difficult one to grapple with. Institutes are too often seen as separate entities. As has been pointed out already, Title IV of the Civil Rights Act makes it possible for school and college personnel to do some strategic planning, and utilize Federal support and consultant help. It was pointed out that there is no standard continuum from total segregation, through token desegregation, to actual desegregation, to final integration. A neat model does not exist, as we know from case studies of many communities. Some localities can make the jump from one end of the continuum to the other almost overnight. Others may become fixated at one point along the way, but with appropriate help skip some intervening steps. Strategic thinking suggests some sensitive appraisal of a given school system, systems, or localities, and then after such study make proposals for the utilization of certain kinds of groups of consultants, types of institutes, numbers of institutes, locations of institutes, and even the sequence of institutes for particular personnel.

Some participants perceived the principal as a key figure in the educational program, and felt that he should particularly be involved in training institutes. Others noted that the most well-meaning principal cannot operate under an ambiguous policy. Also, of course, a determined teacher (on tenure) can sabotage the best efforts of the most adroit administrators.

Yet in many areas the strategic persons can be located if one looks carefully. It is these persons whose support will be crucial in some situations. One need is greater depth of insight into the power structure of the school as an institution in terms of the facilitation of change.

Although a beginning has been made, there is little research to guide school personnel in planning educational change. It would be hoped that one outcome of the current institute and grant program in desegregation might be to throw more light on the ways in which very different kinds of educational institutions and situations can deliberately and more easily adapt to new educational expectations.

VI. What kinds of short-term evaluation and long-term research would be valuable?

Certainly every institute director, every participating school system, and the sponsoring Federal agency would like to know whether the institute experience has been worthwhile. Thus some kinds of evaluations will be in order. The plan for follow-up of institutes provides one kind of evaluation. Shifts in attitudes and understandings on the part of participants can provide some pertinent data, through pre- and post-testing of various kinds.

Although research is not a major focus of the institutes, it appeared to many of the research-oriented participants that here was a very unique opportunity to study social change and assess the differential impact on different individuals of varying kinds of experiences under a variety of circumstances. It is hoped that research interests will be roused to plan research studies independent of the institutes themselves, and call upon other Federal or nonfederal funding resources for support.

Of major concern, however, is that we do not repeat our mistakes, or continue to do that which is of minimal value. One of the easiest things for an institute director to achieve is a feeling on the part of the participants that they had a wonderful experience! Yet this level of evaluation will provide little if any guidance for the planning of subsequent efforts. It is vital that we learn from what we are trying to do in the next few months. Research, if adequately conceived and carried out, can certainly reveal more than we whose egos are involved in seeing that our efforts succeed! Those planning institutes are thus encouraged to call upon available research talent in their own school systems or institutions or elsewhere so that data can be gathered which will help guide the plans for succeeding years.

VII. What kinds of follow-up activities might be considered?

As has been noted, throughout the conference discussion there was awareness of and appreciation for the need for institutes to be planned in terms of later follow-up aid wherever feasible.

Another point, related to the above, but one that emerged as the conference continued, was the possible need for an institute for institute directors. It became apparent that even the consideration of follow-up activities required the kind of thinking and planning which has not typically been the concern of organizers of workshops or institutes. It was also increasingly clear that problems of content, design, strategy, research, were all of such a complex nature that whatever help could be provided by the Equal Educational Opportunities Program would be valued.

Time did not permit extended discussion of this idea, but many participants submitted their reactions in writing. Many felt such an institute for directors would be helpful if set in a "clinic" atmosphere; that is, where specific practical help would be provided. Several suggested smaller meetings by regions, with specialized help available. Another reaction was that it would be useful to bring together institute directors at the end of the summer for an exchange of ideas and experiences.

Summary

Mention was made at several times of the many other programs in the Federal government now working upon the same general area of civil rights. Institutes for teachers of culturally disadvantaged youth and many aspects of the Poverty Program touch on one phase of the problem. Educators are urged to utilize the Equal Educational Opportunities Program to gain information about other Federal resources which might support, supplement, or even be preferable to that available under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act.

Two key words dominated the thinking of the conference participants as they discussed institutes: "variety: and "appropriateness." To this we want to add, "urgency."

As an institute in microcosm, we were reminded by Father Trafford Maher, in his summary statement, that many of us have been operating perhaps under an old and outmoded frame of interracial exchange. That, indeed, the time has come for white and Negro to enter into open, honest, and even heated discussion if we are to move forward significantly. Now that we have been given the legal foundation, and the financial support, it is incumbent upon all of us to make the strenuous, even at times dangerous, steps towards the elimination of the blight of segregation in the educational lives and experiences of our children.

Because of the press of time, I must perforce take all blame for errors of omission and commission in summarizing the conference. Any distortions or biases in reporting are mine, and I merely beg the indulgence of my colleagues who so generously gave their time to the conference. I also would invite their comments, as well as those of any other readers which may help clarify any future, more extensive summary, budget permitting.

Address by Commissioner Francis Keppel

At Leadership Conference on Training Institutes

For School Personnel on Desegregation

Center of Adult Education Wednesday, December 16, 1964

The University of Maryland

Dr. Grambs, Dean Anderson, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I would like to thank the University of Maryland, and in particular -- Dean Anderson, Dr. Jean Grambs, and Dr. Richard Neville, for their effective efforts in making this important conference possible.

We very much appreciate the fact that forty-five outstanding and extremely busy educators, behavioral scientists, and human relations specialists have taken the time to meet together for three days for the purpose of giving the Office of Education -- their advice on crucial questions in the area of desegregation, which should receive attention in institutes which the Office of Education will support under Section 404 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

This conference marks the most significant step taken thus far to launch the Office of Education's Equal Educational Opportunities Program, authorized under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The intent and ultimate design of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is to end discrimination in practice, to close the gap between the ideals we have professed in American life, and the unsatisfactory reality in which we have lived.

In speaking to an Urban League Conference held in Washington last week, President Johnson said:

> No task is more deeply rooted in the complexities of American life. Poverty and tradition, fear and ignorance, the structure of our society and the workings of our economy, all converge on this enormous wrong which has troubled the American conscience from the beginning. Its just solution is essential, not only to give the full blessings of freedom to Negroes, but to liberate all of us.

The President added another challenge which holds particular meaning for educators. "We must," he said, "open the doors of opportunity. But we must also equip our people to walk through those doors."

For too long, educators should have been giving -- and have not given-- their best resources and attention to the children who require them most -- the children of poverty and discrimination.

For too long, we have failed to recognize, and act on our recognition, that "separate but equal" is not freedom and is not equality -- in the South, in the North, or anywhere else.

For too long, we have reacted, not acted -- followed, not led. And we are not alone.

Let us turn for a moment to some of the specific responsibilities of education, of the Office of Education and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, under the Civil Rights Act. Your cooperation as national leaders is essential if these responsibilities are to be met.

The basic intent of the Congress is stated precisely and clearly under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act. Here, with regard to federally-assisted programs -- in education and in other areas -- the Congress has stated:

> No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

To the Office of Education, this means that Federal financial resources must never be used to assist one group, by virtue of color or national origin, to achieve an advantage over another.

It means that Federal funds must never be used to perpetuate segregation in any of its manifest forms.

-Under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act, the Office of Education and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare are given responsibility for active promotion and assistance in the desegregation of public education.

-First, we will conduct a survey and report to the President and to the Congress on the availability of equal educational opportunities in public education at every level.

-Further, we in the Office of Education, will, upon request, assist local schools and communities in the preparation, adoption and implementation of plans for desegregation. We hope to make available accurate and effective information regarding special educational problems occasioned by desegregation.

Section 405 of the Civil Rights Act authorizes the Commissioner of Education to provide grants to school boards to aid them in employing specialists to assist with educational problems occasioned by desegregation, and to develop in-service training programs designed to better equip school personnel to cope with school desegregation problems.

Finally, the Civil Rights Act authorizes us to arrange institutes for the special training of school personnel who, in turn, will enable our schools to deal more effectively with the educational problems of desegregation. During the next three days you will be addressing yourselves to the most important problems which should receive attention in these institutes, you will be making recommendations about the kinds of persons who should attend them, and you will be discussing some promising practices which have been developed over the years which should prove effective in these institutes.

It seems to me that it is most significant that you school superintendents, professors and deans of colleges of education, psychiatrists, psychologists, anthropologists, historians, sociologists, and human relations specialists have taken this time out of your very busy lives to work with us on this important matter. It is of crucial importance that the institutes supported under Section 404 of the Civil Rights Act make a major contribution toward improving the ability of school personnel to cope effectively with problems occasioned by desegregation. These problems call for training which will better equip school personnel to understand themselves, their students, their communities, and sound educational practices, to the end that they will become more effective teachers in a period of great change. In addition, as each of us knows, many of our Negro students have not had educational opportunities equivalent to those of white students, and for that reason, in some instances do not initially meet the achievement levels of some of their fellow students when desegregation begins. We know, therefore, that we must equip our teachers to bridge this educational gap as quickly and as effectively as possible.

The discussions in which you will be engaging during the next few days offer exciting possibilities for a major thrust in improving the ability of school personnel to deal with these problems. I cannot emphasize enough how much we of the Office of Education appreciate your good work. Your guidance will be of major importance to us, and to the colleges and universities which receive the report on this conference.

These tasks in which we are now engaged, on which your counsel is being sought, are new to the Federal Government. Undoubtedly, mistakes will be made. But the importance of effective action cannot be over-estimated.

So we shall move to execute the intent of the law, not only because law and morality require affirmative action, but because good educational practice demands it. By breaking the lock-step of discrimination, we will liberate the full potential of American education.

Universal and voluntary compliance with the Civil Rights Act is, of course, our objective and our hope. Our schools, in helping to attain it, can teach us all that integration will not impair the quality of our schools, as so many fear. On the contrary, we can achieve both quality and equality in education at one and the same time. This, as I see it, is education's critical assignment for 1965.

When we speak of equality in education, however, let us be clear what we mean. To end discrimination and segregation will not alone produce it, nor will the mere intermixing of races assure true equality. If we would achieve equality in substance, not merely in form, we must recognize that our immediate challenge is presented by today's children of poverty and discrimination, and that this calls for initiative above and beyond the fine print of the law.

The challenge of civil rights challenges us all--wherever we are, however it finds us. If education has flaws -- and it has -- it also has enormous potential for leadership. I have faith that we will exercise that leadership at this major turning point for American education.

Our schools should be, can be, the people's major instrument to democratize society, to give substance and meaning to the promise of America. When the creative energies of leaders like you who are assembled here today, are allied and joined with the best traditions of American education, then we shall find beyond legislation for equality, the reality of equality -- in education and in every other realm of our lives.

Ten Years of Prelude

The Story of Integration Since the Supreme Court's 1954 decision.

by BENJAMIN MUSE

The passage into law of the Civil Rights Bill in July 1964 was a culminating point in the struggle of the American Negro, supported by the majority of his fellow countrymen, to achieve equality of civil rights and status.

The prelude to the passage of the Bill, a prelude that began on May 17th 1954 with the Supreme Court's decision declaring segregation in the schools unconstitutional, is set forth here in its historical perspective.

In the ten years that separate these two events diehard anti-Negro sentiment in the South became solidified, inter-racial relations deteriorated, state-rights and anti-Supreme-Court zealots arose, the Ku Klux Klan was revived, and the stage was set for violence. It flared in shocking and dramatic fashion in Little Rock in 1957 and 1958; it smouldered in Virginia and reached a crescendo in Mississippi and Louisiana. Opposition to integration was bitter and bloody, but obedience to the law began to make headway. This is the story Mr. Muse, himself a former Virginia Senator, has to tell—in all its depth of sectional and personal prejudice, political implication and manoeuvre, and moral courage.

The Doctor Has a Heart Attack

by SAMUEL GOODSTONE M.D.

This is a doctor's account of his heart attack and recovery. Who better to write an encouraging but strictly factual book for coronary patients and their families? Dr. Goodstone is a Harvard graduate and has spent most of his life in general practice.

In this book he tells of the circumstances of his attack, of his memories of early days in a hospital bed, and of the gradual adjustment he made to the changes that a new regime for health imposes. Dr. Goodstone speaks of recent medical thinking on the causes of heart attack, and discusses preventive measures which might be taken, exercise, diet and modern methods of treatment.

In addition, he draws upon his own experience to amplify the psychological and deeply emotional factors which may lead heart patients towards renewed health and zest for living.

'The thing to remember,' says Dr. Goodstone, 'is that your attack is not unique. Lots of people have them, get better and pursue useful, productive lives.'

The Spice of Life

A new collection of essays hitherto unpublished in book form.

by G. K. CHESTERTON

This volume contains an entirely new collection of Chesterton's essays hitherto unpublished in book form. Only those essays which clearly stand the test of time have been included. Thus, for example, in the section entitled Essays on Literature in General, there is an essay on Sentimental Literature, another on How to Write a Detective Story and a contribution to the Encyclopaedia Britannica on Humour.

The volume is divided into five parts and the essays are grouped under the following headings: I Essays on Literature in General; II On Particular Books and Writers; III Thought and Belief; IV At Home and Abroad; V The Spice of Life.

In the section On Particular Books and Writers the splendid essays on Shakespeare and Dickens are remarkable for their validity in the light of modern critical thought.

The essay entitled Anti-Religious Thought in the Eighteenth Century is so good as to be in itself sufficient justification for the publication of the collection.

The latter part of the book deals with lighter topics; and The Spice of Life, a most entertaining essay from which the title of the book is taken, was given as a broadcast talk in the last few months of Chesterton's life.

Selected Verses of Mirza Ghalib

Translated by SUFIA SADULLAH

Illustrations by Colin David

Mirza Ghalib (1794–1869) is well known to the educated Urdu-reader in the Indo-Pakistan subcontinent. Excellent film-biographies of Ghalib have been produced both in India and Pakistan and his talent is a monumental part of the great renaissance of Urdu poetry of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Each of the sixty verses chosen and translated by Mrs. Sadullah is illustrated with a line drawing by Colin David.

Mother Edith O.M.S.E.

by SISTER GERTRUDE

This story of the life of Edith Langridge, who was born a century ago, is told with moving simplicity. The reader need not have heard of the small Anglican Sisterhood in India, of which she was the first Mother, to find in these pages a truly inspiring portrait of a dedicated and gracious personality.

Following a distinguished academic career at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford, she became the first Warden of the Lady Margaret Hall Settlement in Lambeth. From there, she sailed in 1902 to become one of the first few members of the Oxford Mission Sisterhood of the Epiphany in India.

First as Sister Superior, and then as first Mother of the order, she devoted her life to her dedication of her whole being to the will of God.

A History of Lancashire

by J. J. BAGLEY

The text of this fully illustrated Delta-Lux paperback is that of the third edition, which has been revised and brought up to date. All the two-colour maps and plates of the third edition are included.

The Times Educational Supplement had this to say of the first edition:

'Its success is due to the wedding of a lucid and economic text to a series of maps—each blessedly on the same page as the relevant letter press—illustrating matters as diverse as the coming of Christianity and Parliamentary representation . . . There is drama enough later, whether one considers the steadfastness of the recusant gentry, or the fantastic rise of the Port of Liverpool . . . Mr. Bagley gives it its due.'

Second Thoughts

by FRANÇOIS MAURIAC

François Mauriac, recognized as one of the world's most distinguished novelists and critics, has selected from his literary journals these penetrating and deeply moving essays on our society and its literature.

The essays on André Gide, Maurice Barrès, Renan, Shakespeare, Proust, D. H. Lawrence and other outstanding writers show the same explosively combative instinct which has for many years led him passionately to defend certain writers and causes, while vehemently attacking others.

The essays he has chosen for the second part, 'Life', vary from his evocative description of 'The first day of the year', and a conducted tour of his house, Malagar, to a discussion on 'The Sleepwalkers' and a brilliant interview with Greta Garbo.

A History of Essex

by A. C. EDWARDS

Of the first edition John Betjeman wrote in a review published in the Daily Telegraph: 'I would be hard put to it to find a better written or more balanced country history, written in terms of its buildings and people, than Arthur C. Edwards's A History of Essex . . . it is a handsome book with well-chosen pictures, and instructive maps. Best of all, it is a work written with a genuine affection for Essex.'

The Club of Queer Trades

The stories in this book are all connected with the activities of the members of that extraordinary little coterie—the Club of Queer Trades. Although not one of G. K. Chesterton's best known works, it is a vintage collection. The stories are both witty and unusual, and exemplify Chesterton's mastery of the short story.

The Man Who Knew Too Much

The majority of the stories are concerned with crime among eminent people, even involving members of the Cabinet, and while Horne Fisher, the man who knew too much, always unearths the criminal, for security and other reasons justice does not usually take its normal course.

These stories exemplify Chesterton's brilliant and unusual approach to the short detective story and will be enjoyed today as much as when they were first published forty years ago.

Four Faultless Felons

Four linked Chesterton stories, written with his characteristic wry, unforced humour, and a touch of mystery; with, behind the gaiety and paradox, a serious vein of social comment. The faultless Felons are: the Moderate Murderer; the Honest Quack; the Ecstatic Thief and the Loyal Traitor.

Subject: Grants to School Boards to Assist in Dealing with Problems Incident to Desegregation

In accordance with your request, we are forwarding the enclosed policies and procedures guide concerning grants to school boards as authorized by Section 405 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Although this guide has not yet received final clearance it is a temporary working document and may be used in developing a draft proposal, as few changes are anticipated. An approved copy will be mailed as soon as it is available.

If a college or university in your area is considering an institute on problems of desegregation, it might prove advantageous for you to contact them about mutual concerns and the possibility of cooperative planning. Since the supply of policies and procedures guides for the conduct of institutes is limited, we are presently unable to include them for the public school personnel who requested these manuals. The manuals will be provided in these cases, but at a later date. Similarly, requests for institute schedules and lists of available materials will be filled as these items are developed.

You will note that grants to school boards are available for: (1) the in-service training of school personnel, (2) the employment of advisory specialists, or (3) a combination of both approaches. Details for completing proposals according to the types of assistance desired are contained in Parts A and B of the manual.

Applications for grants will be processed and reviewed as they are received, and it is anticipated that subsequent notification of the determination made with respect to each proposal will be forthcoming within approximately one month from the date of receipt of the application.

If you wish to contact this Office regarding any aspect of your proposal, you may direct correspondence to us at the following address:

EQUAL EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES PROGRAM

GRANTS TO SCHOOL BOARDS

I. Submission of Proposals

A. Nature and Purpose of the Grants

Under Title IV, Section 405, of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, (Public Law 88-352) the Commissioner of Education is authorized, upon the application of a school board, to make grants to pay, in whole or in part, the cost of:

1. giving to teachers and other school personnel in-service training in dealing with problems incident to desegregation, and

2. employing specialists to advise in problems incident to desegregation.

B. Eligibility for Grants

1. Eligibility of Applicants

Applications for grants may be submitted by any agency which administers a system of one or more public schools and any other agency which is responsible for the assignment of students to or within such a system. Eligible applicants would include:

a. Any State department of education.

b. Any local board of education.

c. Any other board governing an area, regional, or district school system.

2. Eligibility of Programs

Grant awards will be made only for programs dealing with problems incident to desegregation, as distinguished from ordinary operating activities of the school system of the applicant. "Problems incident to desegregation" means those problems arising from the assignment of students to and within public schools without regard to differences in their race, color, religion, or national origin; other than problems uniquely related to the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance.

Applications may be made for grant funds to be used for the in-service training of school personnel in dealing with problems incident to desegregation. "In-service training" includes all classroom, laboratory, field, and study experiences constituting a planned learning situation designed to provide school personnel with new knowledge, skills, insights, and attitudes which may be used to bring about the solution of identified problems related to desegregation within the school system of the applicant. These in-service training programs may be concerned with improving the ability to cope with desegregation problems of any of the several categories, or combination or categories, of "school personnel," e.g., teachers, teacher aides, interns, counselors, supervisors, principals, administrators, health personnel, secretarial-clerical workers, custodial-maintenance workers, cafeteria workers, drivers, officers of school-related organizations, and school board members.

Applications may also be made for grant funds to be used to employ specialists to advise the applicant school board, or personnel in the school system of the applicant, with respect to the solution of problems related to desegregation within that system. A "specialist" must be a person having the professional training or experience appropriate to the particular element or phase of the problem incident to desegregation for which advice is requested by the applicant. The services of the specialists are to be in an advisory capacity only. The advice may consist of information, demonstration, guidance planning or other technical assistance, or the provision of appropriate illustrative or demonstrative materials. The specialist may not assume a line administrative position or a direct operating position within the applicant's school system.

C. Characteristics of Grant-Supported Programs

Grant-supported programs, whether for in-service training of school personnel or for the employment of advisory specialists, should be tailored to meet the particular needs of the school system of the applicant. It is recognized that no single program approach is suitable for the wide variety of problems which may confront school system officials. It is also recognized that these officials are usually in the best position to identify the important elements of the problems with which they must deal. The nature of school desegregation problems, however, suggests the desirability of careful consideration of several general program characteristics in the program planning prior to the development of the grant application. These characteristics are briefly described below in order to draw attention to areas where creative and imaginative thinking should be directed in relation to the specific problems of the applicant. Assistance with any phase of program planning or proposal development may, upon request, be arranged through the Equal Educational Opportunities Program office.

1. Problem Identification

Accurate identification of the key factors causing the particular problem or problems incident to school desegregation in the school system of the applicant is crucial to the success of any attempt to alleviate those problems. Applicants should make certain that this point has been given adequate consideration prior to attempts to develop the details of the program proposal. The specific reference in Title IV of the Act to "special educational problems" clearly indicates that problems of instruction and curriculum within the multi-cultural schools, as well as problems of inter-personal and inter-group relations, are to be the targets of programs financed under this Title.

Examples of areas which should be considered in any analysis of school desegregation problems follow:

- the differences between the value systems of (middle and lower) different racial and class sub-cultures in the community and the implication of these for the classroom situation.

- the characteristics of an impoverished community and the nature, causes, and the effects of cultural deprivation.

- the relationship of student potentials to attained levels of achievement, with emphasis on the effects that educational, social, and economic conditions have on this achievement.

- the professional skills needed in analyzing instructional problems, particularly those involved in correcting serious educational deficiencies experienced by disadvantaged children.

- the controlling personal and environmental factors involved in the teacher-learning process.

- the ways and means of organizing the school and classroom for instructional quality.

- the new curriculum materials, content, and approaches helpful in meeting instructional problems of disadvantaged or minority groups.

- the design of vocational, special education, and other specialized programs needed to provide instruction appropriate to individual student differences.

- the creation and organization of pupil-personnel programs to give adequate attention to student needs in areas of counseling and guidance, school attendance, and health.

- the insights into typical behavior patterns and attitudes of disadvantaged children necessary to the ability to empathize with these persons.

774-278 O-65-2

- the procedures required for dealing with disciplinary problems resulting from a lack of understanding and communication among students and student groups.

- the planning, content, organization, and conduct of extra-curricular activities in situations involving students from different backgrounds.

- the personnel problems of the professional staff, including policies on the recruitment and assignment of teachers and the role of teacher organizations in the solution of school system problems.

- the establishment and support of training programs to improve the ability of various categories of school personnel to deal with school desegregation problems.

- the creation of adequate community understanding and support for school desegregation programs.

- the problems of school administration unique to the desegregated school situation, including the preparation of school desegregation plans.

2. Planning the Program Approach

After the identification of key problem factors has been accomplished, the approach for solving these problems should be selected. A grant program proposal may be directed toward three basic approaches: in-service training of school personnel, the employment of advisory specialists, or a combination of both. In addition, the school system of the applicant may coordinate the grant program activities with other measures which are not eligible for grant support. Whatever the nature of the program, it should explore the possibility of new and different ideas in view of the unique circumstances of each situation. The program should also be based on careful planning which gives attention to the following:

a. Objectives: The plan developed by the applicant should be based upon a clearly-stated set of specific objectives which, if realized, would be expected to make a significant contribution to the solution of the problem.

b. Procedures: In designing the program, the applicant should strive to develop procedures which will obtain maximum results from the resources expended. Program planning will often be strengthened if it is a cooperative venture, with representatives from the various categories of school personnel encouraged to present their ideas and suggestions for program content and procedure. The aplicant should also explore the possibilities of joint program planning with neighboring school systems and with area institutions of higher education. The neighboring school systems may have similar problems relating to school desegregation, and the concentration of planning efforts may permit more extensive programs to be conducted cooperatively than might be possible for any one system. Working with institutions of higher education will permit the coordination of school system programs of in-service training with the institutes sponsored by those institutions, again bringing a greater concentration of resources to bear upon the problems involved than might occur through independent activity.

In-service training programs should strive for optimum conditions within, and coordination between, each of the following program elements:

(1) Method of presentation: While the presentation of information by classroom lecture is undoubtedly of value as an integral part of many learning situations, care should be taken that it does not become an exclusive method of in-service training. Education which involves behavioral and attitudinal change among its objectives would seem to require emphasis upon other methods. Demonstration, individual participation and involvement in process, practical application of learning by trainees, and continuing on-the-job supervision by instructors are especially suited to programs designed to improve the abilities of persons to cope with school desegregation problems. Since the ultimate test of these abilities is in the school and the community, training programs which use these locations for laboratory and field experiences can be particularly relevant to the general purposes for which grant support is provided. In fact, many training programs will undoubtedly be developed primarily around practical laboratory work.

(2) Schedule of training sessions: The frequency, length, and duration of scheduled sessions should be closely related to the objectives and methods of presentation of the training program. Programs should extend over a period of time sufficient for concepts to be developed, attitudes to be examined, and new techniques to be mastered. They should include necessary time for effective and continuing supervision of trainee personnel.

(3) Selection of participants: It would seem wise to direct programs, whenever possible, to those personnel who can best serve as leaders in their respective work areas, influencing the attitudes and practices of their co-workers. In this manner, the effects of direct program activities can be multiplied through stages of subsequent activities by the program participants, and can thus have a maximum effect.

Programs involving advisory specialists should contain plans, developed prior to the actual employment or selection of the specialists, which specify the nature of the assistance sought, the importance of this assistance, the role of the specialist(s) in relation to regular members of the school system staff, the persons or groups with whom he is to work, and the time and location conditions under which he will work.

3. Staff

Staff personnel used in either the in-service training program or the advisory specialist program may be employed full-time or part-time. Persons supported by a grant may be used only for the purpose stated in the proposal submitted by the applicant, as this has been approved by the Commissioner. Personnel time approved for in-service training programs may be used only for these programs. Advisory specialists may be used only in an advisory capacity, although their advice may be provided on any problem(s) incident to school desegregation, including those pertaining to matters of in-service teacher training. Coordination of the advisory-specialist program and the in-service training program can result in maximum use of available resources. Where both programs are desired, this coordination should be reflected in the details of the proposal submitted by the applicant, including an apportioning of the total time of specialists working in both programs.

On the planning process, an adequate amount of staff time should be allocated to each program activity, so that program goals may be effectively pursued.

Personnel selected as key staff for either the in-service training program or the advisory-specialist program should have demonstrated competency in the area in which they are to be utilized.

4. Facilities and Equipment

It is essential that proper facilities and equipment be planned in order to obtain maximum learning results from expenditures of time and funds for staff and participants. If necessary equipment for in-service training or advisory-specialist programs is not available, and cannot otherwise be obtained, funds required for the rental or purchase of this equipment may be included for consideration in the proposed budget of the application. In analyzing needs for materials and equipment in any part of the program, applicants should investigate the availability of such items through the Cooperative Research, National Defense Education, and Vocational Education Programs of the U.S. Office of Education, in addition to State and local resources which may be available.

5. Administrative and Service Requirements

The programs relating to problems incident to school desegregation should receive competent and continuous direction. If this direction cannot be provided by the chief administrator of the school system, a specific individual should be designated as director, with authority delegated that is appropriate to the responsibilities involved.

Support and maintenance functions are important to effective program operation. These functions include: transportation of in-service training program participants for field trips; transportation of non-participant school-personnel for observation of demonstration projects at the in-service training program site; transportation of staff and advisory personnel to obtain information for planning and operation, on trips inside and outside of the school system; telephone and other communications pertinent to program operation; building-facility operation and maintenance; and, food, recreation, and housing arrangements for participants or staff, where these are necessary. In planning for these functions, their effect on the accomplishments of the programs they support should be carefully considered.

6. Evaluation and Dissemination

Program plans and procedures should contain provisions for continuous and terminal evaluation of program activities. While this need not be an elaborate system of data collection and analysis, enough information should be obtained to enable an assessment of the progress being made toward program objectives and to provide a basis for the dissemination of knowledge acquired concerning effective solutions to problems of school desegregation. The Equal Educational Opportunities Program office will provide, upon request, assistance to school systems that desire to establish procedures for self-evaluation of in-service training or advisory specialist programs. In addition, the Program office will carry out its general responsibility for evaluating the total Program operation, through report analysis, on site visits, and other measures in cooperation with school system officials.

Applicants are encouraged to develop imaginative ways in which new knowledge can be shared, both within the total school system of the applicant and with school systems elsewhere. In-service training programs based on laboratory or field training situations can usually capitalize on the opportunity to use these situations as demonstration centers, involving many more persons in an introduction to the content of the program than can be accommodated directly in the more intensive training activities of the program.

D. Responsibility for Development of a Grant Proposal

Although the Equal Educational Opportunities Program office stands ready to provide professional assistance upon the request of an applicant, the detailed development of a proposal must and should remain the responsibility of the applicant. The nature and extent of assistance given will be dependent upon staff or consultant availability and budgetary limitations.

E. Purpose of a Proposal

The purpose of a proposal is to inform the Commissioner of the nature and scope of the program that the applicant desires to conduct. All proposals that are received in the Program office will be reviewed and evaluated in terms of the criteria set forth in Section I-M of this manual. A proposal for an institute will be considered only once. If a particular proposal does not result in an offer of a grant, it will not be reconsidered for a subsequent period. However, the institution may resubmit the proposal, with such revisions as may be appropriate, for consideration at any time.

F. Submission Dates

Applications for grant awards under the Equal Educational Opportunities Program may be submitted at any time. Inasmuch as funds are limited, it will be to the advantage of the applicants to submit applications as soon as proposal plans have been adequately developed and the proposal description has been formulated. It is essential, however, that all available program funds be committed to active projects, and the school system of the applicant should be prepared to commence the program described in the proposal within three months from the beginning date specified in the application.

G. Award Periods

Grant awards will be made only from funds appropriated for the current fiscal year since the Office of Education is not in a position to commit funds until they are appropriated by the Congress. Once obligated, the award funds will remain available during the award period which may continue into or through the fiscal year following that during which the award is made.

Applicants are encouraged to develop long-range programs and to submit proposals covering an entire program rather than to make subsequent applications for continuations of a program. If approval is indicated upon the initial evaluation of the proposal, the continuation of a program beyond the availability of funds from the current fiscal year will receive priority consideration over any new proposals submitted, provided: (1) that adequate funds are available for the year(s) involved; (2) that for a particular in-service training program for the year(s) specified will be carried out essentially as proposed or as modified by mutual agreement; and (3) that a high quality of in-service training program offering is maintained during the initial award period. It is expected that requests for support beyond a two or three year period will be considered on the basis of a new proposal submitted at the appropriate time.

H. Applicant Contribution

In the proposal budget, the applicant is requested to indicate the contribution in funds, goods, or services that will be made to the program by the applicant. No proposal will be rejected on the basis of any lack of applicant contribution. It is expected, however, that school systems in a position to bear a portion of the program operation cost will do so where this is possible. For continuing projects, it is expected that the participant will assume proportionately greater share of the total program cost in successive years of operation.

I. Instructions for Submission of Applications

1. Information Required

All applications must pertain to proposals for in-service training or advisory-specialist programs to be conducted in the applicant school board's system. The applications should follow the proposal format indicated below, and must contain all of the

All application copies required, including the signed copies, should be sent to:

Grants Branch
Equal Educational Opportunities Program
U.S. Office of Education

In preparing the description, identify each item of the proposal by using the number and the under-lined words given in the outline. Other sub-headings indicated may be used, but are not essential. The material presented under each item of the outline is for explanatory or informative purposes only and should be considered in relation to the exact problem circumstances confronting the applicant.

Part A--In-Service Training Program Proposal

1. Problem: Give a brief statement of the problem, explaining its importance to the school system of the applicant and its specific relationship to school desegregation. The problem description should focus on the key factors related to the problem(s). Information on such topics as the following may be applicable:

   a. Nature of the problem.

   b. Specific causes of the current problem situation.

   c. Immediate and probable long-range effects of the problem situation on the quality of education in the school system and on equality of educational opportunity.

   d. Estimated community understanding of the problem.

   e. Previous attempts to alleviate the problem.

   f. Primary reasons for planning the proposed program of action.

2. General statistical information: Indicate the number of schools, pupils, and teachers involved in the problem situation; and, the current state of segregation and desegregation in schools and classes, among students and faculty. (Estimates are acceptable when exact data are unavailable.)

3. Objectives: State the specific objectives toward which the in-service training program will be directed and the ways in which these are expected to affect the problem. As much as possible, these objectives should be described in terms of the estimated accomplishments of the program, accomplishments which might be measured in an evaluation of the program or its procedures.

4. Procedures: Describe the procedures contemplated for use in the program of in-service training. Give as much detail as is necessary to provide a clear understanding of each of the following:

   a. Type of Program: Indicate the general type of program planned--whether the proposed program is to be conducted by staff members of the school system of the applicant, by staff members from a nearby college, university, community organization, or other agency, or in conjunction with a training institute conducted by an institution of higher education under Section 404 of P.L. 88-352.

   b. Program Content: Describe the general content of the program, in terms of the skills to be learned, materials to be developed, information to be gained, or other experiences designed to benefit the participants in improving their ability to deal with problems incident to school desegregation.

c. Methods: In describing the methods of training to be used, indicate specific classroom, laboratory, or field situations which will be utilized to accomplish the program objectives. Indicate how training program participants are to receive consultation and guidance from the program staff both during and following the intensive training sessions. If curriculum or instructional materials are to be developed as part of the in-service training program, indicate the general nature of these.

d. Frequency and Duration of Training Sessions: Indicate the structure of the training sessions in terms of: length of individual session; length of total program; scheduling of training sessions within the school week--whether during normal working hours or outside of them--or during weekends; provisions for time for laboratory sessions, field excursions, and research and study time.

e. Evaluation: Describe the techniques which will be used to evaluate the kind and amount of contribution that the in-service training program makes to the solution of problems incident to desegregation within the applicant school system.

f. Dissemination: Describe how the results of the in-service training sessions will be disseminated throughout the applicant school system or to other interested school systems or agencies, e.g., newsletters, radio or television programs, staff meetings, journal articles, etc.

5. Selection of Participants: Participant selection is the responsibility of the applicant school system, but the procedures used must be in harmony with the overall objectives of the Equal Educational Opportunities Program. A description must be given of the selection procedures and criteria to be used for the in-service training program that is proposed. The description should include an indication of the type of school personnel which will receive the training (e.g., teachers, supervisors, counselors, administrators, classified, or other), the number of participants to be included, the basis upon which selections are to be made, and by whom selections are to be made.

6. Staff Personnel: Indicate the persons who will be responsible for the operation of the in-service training program--whether members of the school staff, college or university staff, community leaders, or personnel from community, civic, social, or welfare agencies. Where possible, give the names and general qualifications of the key personnel involved in directing or conducting the program, e.g., present position title, degrees, major fields of preparation, certification, experience, and other pertinent information. The use of community resource persons in an in-service training program is encouraged, provided that the purpose of using the services of the resource persons is to contribute to the learning experience of the participants, and that the anticipated use of such resource persons, how they shall be used, and the anticipated number and types of such persons are set forth in the procedures section of the program proposal. Indicate the program position each individual will occupy. Next to each name indicate whether these individuals have been contacted and are willing to serve in the capacity desired. If specific personnel arrangements cannot be indicated, outline the desired staffing plans for the program.

7. Facilities: Indicate the location of the training sessions--whether they are to be held in a school-system facility or at some other site. Describe the facilities available for the program, in terms of the number and nature of classrooms, conference rooms, laboratories, libraries or other teaching spaces required.

8. Materials and Equipment: Special requirements of materials or equipment should be described, including the relationship of these requirements to the program objectives.

9. Special Administrative and Service Requirements: Support functions necessary to successful operation of the in-service training program should be outlined, e.g., program direction, travel, communications, cooperation with other agencies, etc.

10. Time Schedule: Indicate, using calendar dates, the time schedule anticipated for major phases of the proposed program.

11. Other Information: Make a brief statement concerning each of the following items. This information will in no way jeopardize approval of the proposal.

    a. Indicate the amount of support available for this project from sources other than the applicant school system or agency, e.g., foundation funds, governmental grants, private donations.

    b. Indicate whether this proposal has been, or will be, submitted to any other agency.

    c. Indicate whether this is a proposed extension of or addition to a project previously or currently supported by the Office of Education.

12. Budget: (Start this section on a new page in the proposal.) In a tabular presentation similar to the following format, itemize the estimated cost of the in-service training program. Round all amounts to the nearest ten dollars. In the first column list the items of expenditure, using the categories shown. After each line item, add a brief parenthetical statement which explains how the cost of the item was computed. (Do not include in your proposal the explanatory information shown in the format.) In subsequent columns indicate, by line item, the funds requested from the Office of Education for each of the years of the proposed program, by fiscal year, and the estimated dollar value of the goods and services to be contributed by the institution or agency during each fiscal year. (A fiscal year extends from July 1 to June 30 and bears the year designation of the last six months.) At the bottom of each column indicate the Subtotal (sum of direct costs) and the Total (direct costs plus overhead) for the particular fiscal year. Repeat this process for each fiscal year of the proposed program. Present a Grand Subtotal figure and a Grand Total figure for the entire proposal, entering these figures on the Cover Page as well as at the close of the budget section.

Proposed Budget

In-Service Training Program Under Title IV, Sec. 405, of P.L. 88-352

Submitted by: Official name and address of the applicant school board or agency.

Duration: Beginning Date_____ Ending Date_____

NOTE: Salaries, service charges, travel costs, etc., must conform to the standard rate of the school board or agency, within the maximum limitations indicated. Amounts paid in accordance with standard rates of the school board or agency which are in excess of maximum limitations, for categories where these exist, may be shown as applicant contributions to the program.

AMOUNT REQUIRED FOR FISCAL YEAR:_____

ITEM	Grant Funds	Applicant or other funds
DIRECT COSTS: Direct costs are those that are specifically incurred in the conduct of the program. These may include the following:
a. Compensation for Personal Services: Includes salaries, wages, and honoraria directly attributable to the program, for the director of the program, instructional staff, special lecturers, secretaries, clerks, or other personnel. Such compensation should be charged at the actual rates paid by the applicant. Where any person works less than full-time on the program, reasonable estimates of time spent on the program may be used in determining the part of the salary to be charged to the program. List all position titles, and state the percent of time on the program and the per annum or per diem salary of each person.
b. Compensation for Substitute Personnel: Includes the salaries or wages of substitute personnel required to take the place of program participants when the in-service training is conducted during normal school hours.

c. Employee Services and Benefits: Includes costs such as insurance, social security, pension, etc. when not included as part of the cost of personal services or substitute personnel.

d. Compensation for Participants: Includes payment of teachers and other school personnel for actual participation in in-service training outside of regular school hours. This additional compensation is to be at the rate of $3 per hour, or the hourly rate at which the individual is paid by the grantee, whichever is less, not to exceed $15 per day or $75 per week. Compensation above these rates may be paid, but not from the Federal funds portion.

e. Supplies, Materials, and Equipment: Amounts required for ordinary operating supplies and training materials should be indicated by subtotals for each of those two categories. Amounts required for special training materials or for the rental or purchase of equipment necessary to the effective operation of the proposed in-service training program should be indicated for each type of item required.

f. Tuition and Fees Payments: Includes payment of tuition for participants in in-service training programs if these involve attendance at institutions of higher education or in approved courses or activities conducted by other agencies. The per capita costs involved should be indicated. In no instances are tuition or fee costs to be included in grant proposals for attendance at institutes or other activities receiving Federal support for these costs.

g. Travel:

(1) Instructors: Other than air transportation, travel will be in accordance with the established policy of the grantee, except that allowances from Federal funds for travel by private automobile shall not exceed 9¢ per mile. Travel or an allowance for same may be paid to visiting instructors and special lecturers, from place of residence or employment to the site of the program and return, as well as to members of the program staff, when necessary for the effective conduct of the training program. When air transportation is used, first-class accommodations may normally be used only if (a) less than first-class is not available (providing reservation was requested within 24 hours after the traveler had knowledge of the trip), (b) less than first-class requires circuitous routing, (c) less than first-class requires travel to begin or end at unreasonable hours (e.g., if scheduled arrival is after 9:00 p.m.), (d) less than first-class would result in additional direct costs which offset the transportation savings, or (e) less than first-class will not make connections with other flights or means of transportation for continuation of the journey. It is recognized that, under unusual circumstances, use of first-class accommodations may be warranted for reasons, other than those set forth in the foregoing paragraph. Such circumstances, however, should arise rarely and then only for good and sufficient reasons.

(2) Participants: Allowances for local travel necessary to the effective operation of the proposed in-service training program may be made in accordance with the established policy of the applicant, except that allowances from Federal funds for individual or joint travel by private automobile shall not exceed 9¢ per mile. This travel may be for purposes of transporting participants from place of residence or employment to the site of the program and return. It may also be for field trips, visitations or similar program activities. Enter these two types of participant travel as separate line items. Justification for participant travel other than that of a local nature must be given. If approved, allowances may be made as for instructors in (1).

h. Communications: Includes long distance telephone calls, telegrams, and postage which are directly attributable to and necessary for the implementation and conduct of the specific program.

i. Printing: Includes the cost of printing brochures, reports, and nominal items which are specifically required for the conduct or promotion of the program.

j. Transportation Costs: Includes freight, express, cartage, and parcel post relating either to goods purchased, in process, or delivered.

k. Services: Itemize requirements for statistical, duplicating, testing, or other services to be performed in conjunction with the in-service training program.
l. Other: List other essential items not listed above.
SUBTOTAL
INDIRECT COSTS: Indirect costs are actual overhead costs, not to exceed 20% of the total Federal direct cost. If the local rate results in a greater amount, the difference between it and Federal overhead may be shown as a local contribution. Give the basis on which the local overhead is computed. (See Section II F-3.) Where possible, applicants are requested to consider the assumption of overhead costs as an applicant contribution.
TOTAL

REPEAT THE ABOVE INFORMATION FOR EACH FISCAL YEAR FOR THE DURATION OF THE PROPOSED PROGRAM, EITHER IN COLUMNS PARALLEL TO THOSE FOR THE FIRST FISCAL YEAR, OR IN SUBSEQUENT SECTIONS AS ABOVE

PART A GRAND SUBTOTAL _____

PART A GRAND TOTAL _____
(Includes all overhead)

Part B--Employment of Advisory Specialists Proposals

1. Problem: Give a brief statement of the problem, explaining its importance to the applicant school system and its specific relationship to the problem of school desegregation. The problem description should consider the items suggested in Part A-1. If employment of the advisory specialist(s) constitutes a phase of a program in which in-service training is also included, the problem need be described only once, under Part A-1 of the application. If the employment of advisory specialists is directed at different problems, indicate the nature of those problems here.

2. Objectives of the Proposed Employment of Advisory Specialists: State the specific objectives toward which the employment of the advisory specialist(s) will be directed. If the employment of the advisory specialist(s) is a phase of the program of which in-service training is a part, you need only indicate the extent that the objectives differ from those stated in Part A-2. As much as possible, these objectives should be described in terms of the estimated accomplishments which might be measured in an evaluation of program procedures. These may include a discussion of specific goals related to the following general problem areas, among others:

   a. The study and survey of the nature and extent of problems incident to desegregation existing in the school system of the applicant.

   b. The determination of new ways of organizing the school and classroom for instructional quality in desegregated school situations.

   c. The introduction or development of new curriculum materials, content, and approaches helpful in meeting educational problems involved in school desegregation.

   d. The organization of guidance and counseling programs to give adequate attention to individual students needs within the desegregated school environment.

   e. The establishment of training programs to improve the ability of school personnel to deal with problems related to school desegregation.

   f. The development of a program of community understanding and support of school desegregation.

   g. The resolution of unique problems of school administration pertaining to aspects of school desegregation.

   h. The preparation of a school desegregation plan to assign students to or within public schools without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin.

   i. The implementation of a school desegregation plan.

   j. The development of policies and programs to prevent resegregation.

3. Procedures: Describe the procedures planned for use of the specialists to be employed in advising the applicant on problems incident to desegregation.

Give as much detail as is appropriate about each of the following:

a. The general type of assignment to be performed by the specialist(s).

b. Description of type(s) of individuals or groups with whom the specialist(s) will be working.

c. Brief description of the manner that will be employed in selecting the advisory specialist(s).

d. Nature of the supervision to be given the advisory specialist(s).

e. Describe the techniques which will be used to evaluate the performance of the advisory specialist(s).

4. Personnel: If possible, give the following information for each of the specialists you plan to employ. If specific personnel arrangements cannot be indicated, outline the desired staffing pattern for the program. Specialists employed from grant funds at any time during the grant award period must be approved by the Office of Education prior to their employment.

a. Name and present position.

b. Address.

c. General qualifications as an advisory specialist, e.g., degrees, major fields of preparation, experience, and other pertinent information. Briefly cite the key factors upon which the decision to employ this individual was based. If specific personnel arrangements cannot be indicated, outline the qualifications of each specialist position desired.

d. Next to the name of each specialist listed indicate whether the individual has been contacted and is willing to serve in the capacity desired.

5. Other Information: Any other information pertinent to the employment of advisory specialists that would be useful in the evaluation of the proposal may be indicated.

6. Time Schedule: Indicate, using calendar dates, the time schedule anticipated for the employment of advisory specialists, beginning and ending dates, amount of time available per week, etc.

7. Other Information: Make a brief statement concerning each of the following items. This information will in no way jeopardize approval of the proposal.

a. Indicate the amount of support available for this project from sources other than applicant school system or agency.

b. Indicate whether this proposal has been submitted to any other agency.

c. Indicate whether this is a proposed extension of or addition to a project previously or currently supported by the Office of Education.

8. Budget: (Start this section on a new page in the proposal.) In a tabular presentation similar to the following format, itemize the estimated cost of the advisory specialist program. Round all amounts to the nearest ten dollars. In the first column list the items of expenditure, using the categories shown. After each line item, add a brief parenthetical statement which explains how the cost of the item was computed. (Do not include in your proposal the explanatory information shown in the format.) In subsequent columns indicate, by line item, the funds requested from the Office of Education for each of the years of the proposed program, by fiscal year, and the estimated dollar value of the goods and services to be contributed by the institution or agency during each fiscal year. (A fiscal year extends from July 1 to June 30 and bears the year designation of the last six months.) At the bottom of each column indicate the Subtotal (sum of direct costs) and the Total (direct costs plus overhead) for the particular fiscal year. Repeat this process for each fiscal year of the proposed program. Present a Grand Subtotal figure and a Grand Total figure for the entire proposal, entering these figures on the Cover Page as well as at the close of the budget section.

b. Employee Services and Benefits: Includes costs such as insurance, social security, pension, etc., when not included as part of the cost of personal services.
c. Supplies, Materials, and Equipment: Amounts required for ordinary operating supplies and training materials should be indicated by subtotals for each of those two categories. Amounts required for special training materials, or for the rental or purchase of equipment necessary to the effective operation of the proposed advisory specialist program should be indicated for each type of item required.

d. Travel:

(1) Advisory Specialists: Other than air transportation, travel will be in accordance with the established policy of the grantee, except that allowances from Federal funds for travel by private automobile shall not exceed 9¢ per mile. Travel or an allowance for same may be paid to advisory specialists, from place of residence or employment to the site of the program and return, as well as to members of the program staff, when necessary for the effective conduct of the training program. When air transportation is used, first-class accommodations may normally be used only if (a) less than first-class is not available (providing reservation was requested within 24 hours after the traveler had knowledge of the trip), (b) less than first-class requires circuitous routing, (c) less than first-class requires travel to begin or end at unreasonable hours (e.g., if scheduled flight time is before 8:00 a.m. and scheduled arrival is after 9:00 p.m.), (d) less than first-class would result in additional direct costs which offset the transportation savings, or (e) less than first-class will not make connections with other flights or means of transportation for continuation of the journey. It is recognized that, under unusual circumstances, use of first-class accomodations may be warranted for reasons other than those set forth in the foregoing paragraph. Such circumstances, however, should arise rarely and then only for good and sufficient reasons.

e. Communications: Includes long distance telephone calls, telegrams, and postage which are directly attributable to and are necessary for the implementation and conduct of the specific program.

f. Printing: Includes the cost of printing brochures, reports, and nominal items which are specifically required for the conduct or promotion of the program.

g. Transportation Costs: Includes freight, express, cartage, and parcel post relating either to goods purchased, in process, or delivered.

h. Services: Itemize requirements for statistical, duplicating, testing, or other proposed services needed in the advisory specialist program.

i. Other: List other essential items not listed above.

SUBTOTAL

INDIRECT COSTS: Indirect costs are actual overhead costs, not to exceed 20% of the total Federal direct cost. If the local rate results in a greater amount, the difference between it and Federal overhead may be shown as a local contribution. Give the basis on which the local overhead is computed. (See Section II F-3.) Where possible, applicants are requested to consider the assumption of overhead costs as an applicant contribution.

PART B GRAND SUBTOTAL _____

PART B GRAND TOTAL _____
(Includes all overhead)

Part C--Financial and Other Resources of the Applicant

Section 405 (b) of P.L. 88-352 states that in determining whether to make a grant, and in fixing the amount thereof and the terms and conditions on which it will be made, the Commissioner of Education shall take into consideration the financial condition of the applicant and the other resources available to it, in addition to such other factors as he finds relevant. The information requested in this section is for the purpose of assisting in this determination.

1. Schedule of Needed Federal Funds: Using the amount of the total Federal grant requested as a basis, estimate the portion (rounded to the nearest $10) of these funds which will be required during each month through June of the current fiscal year. If the proposal extends for more than one fiscal year, continue the monthly estimate for the duration of the proposed program.

2. Assessed Valuation:

   a. Indicate the current total actual assessed valuation supporting the applicant school system, and the actual assessed valuation per pupil.

   b. Indicate the current or latest available (give year) average percent that assessed valuation is of true valuation within the applicant school system, and the means or the authority by which this figure was determined.

   c. Indicate the current full-value assessed valuation supporting the applicant school system (i.e., item a. divided by item b.), and the full-value assessed valuation per pupil.

3. Per-Capita Income: State the current or latest available (give year) annual per-capita income of inhabitants of the applicant school system or, if figures for the school system are not available, of another governmental unit (identify) most nearly coterminous with the boundaries of the applicant school system for which figures are available. Indicate the means or the authority by which the figure presented was determined.

4. System Taxing Ability:

   a. Indicate the current tax rate established for the applicant school system, by total rate and by rates for sub-categories or funds if these are applicable.

   b. Indicate the current maximum tax rate available to the system, without referendum, for each category given in a.

5. State Aid:

   a. State the total amount and the per-pupil average of State aid received by the applicant school system for the most current distribution year (give year).

   b. Indicate the basis of State general-aid distribution applicable to the applicant school system.

   c. Give the specific values for each factor entering into the computation of the State general-aid distribution for the most current distribution year.

6. Expenditure-Per-Pupil:

   a. State the average per-pupil total expenditure for operating purposes (excluding capital outlay and debt service expenditures) made by the applicant school system for each of the past three school years. Indicate the average budgeted expenditure per pupil for the current school year.

7. Other Resources: Indicate by general category the financial and external assistance resources available to the applicant school system, other than the tax and aid resources cited above.

8. Other Information: The applicant should present any additional information that would be of value in determining the financial condition of its school system and the need for the Federal funds which are requested in the application.

Part D--Attachments

If any of the following items apply to the proposal being submitted, provide the information requested in each instance. Each attachment should appear as a separate item on separate pages.

1. Instruments, Materials, or Procedures: Unpublished data-gathering instruments, samples of materials to be developed, bibliographies, detailed examples of procedures, reports of pilot studies, etc., may be attached if they are key factors in the proposed program.

2. Revisions: If this application is being resubmitted, append a statement describing the major revisions which have been made. This does not apply to those applications which have been submitted previously in draft form for informal review.

K. Subsequent Requests for Continued Support

In cases where continued support was not requested or approved in the original application, the Office of Education will consider subsequent requests for such support in equal competition with all other proposals pending at the time of such request. Consequently, these requests should contain the same information as any other proposal, in addition to a resume of progress to date. Because of the amount of time for review and evaluation that is required, such requests should be submitted well in advance of the anticipated termination date of the original grant if the grantee wants uninterrupted support.

L. Procedures for Application Evaluation

1. Evaluation

Applications for grants will be evaluated as they are received by the Office of Education. A preliminary review will be made to ascertain that the application is complete, that it conforms to the format indicated above, and that the conditions of eligibility have been met. A technical evaluation of the proposal in relation to the defined objectives will be made by a specialist in the Equal Educational Opportunities Program. Following this evaluation, the proposal will be submitted to an advisory panel within the Office of Education for their evaluation, which will take into account, among other pertinent factors, the criteria listed below.

2. Disposition

The ratings assigned by the Program Specialist and the advisory panel will form the basis for a recommendation to the Commissioner who will then (1) approve the application in whole or in part, (2) disapprove the application, or (3) defer action on the application for such reasons as lack of funds or a need for further evaluation. Any deferral or disapproval of an application will not preclude its reconsideration or resubmission.

M. Criteria for Evaluation of Application

Proposals in applications submitted for grants under Section 405 of P.L. 88-352 will be rated, in part, in accordance with the following criteria:

1. Program Significance

a. The problem(s) toward which the program is directed is of relative major importance in meeting successfully the problems of school desegregation.

b. The program is focused on identified key factors of problems incident to or occasioned by school desegregation, as these exist in the school system of the applicant.

c. The results of the activities to be undertaken in the program may be anticipated to be valuable throughout the school system of the applicant, and in other similar school systems that have similar problems.

d. The program will result in the development of new and promising models either for the education profession as a whole or for the applicant school system.

2. Plan and Procedures

a. The problem(s), objectives, and procedures are clearly and concisely stated with a reasonable amount of detail.

b. The problem(s) and objectives are appropriately delimited, so as to make the scope of the program feasible in view of the resources available.

c. The proposal gives evidence of a logical rationale based on a knowledge of related and currently used methods and materials.

d. The relationship between the problem, objectives, and program procedures is clear and appropriate to a problem solution.

e. The criteria and procedures for selection of participants are appropriate to the identified need and objectives of the program, and are designed to obtain a "multiplier" effect through selection of leadership personnel for training, whenever this is possible.

f. The objectives and procedures are technically sound.

g. The procedures include provisions for obtaining a continuity of program effect over an extended period of time.

h. The proposal includes provisions for an adequate evaluation of the effectiveness of the program, including an evaluation of the methods and materials to be developed or employed in the program.

i. The proposal includes provisions for making significant program results available for possible dissemination to other school systems.

j. The proposal indicates that the cooperation which may be needed from the community or school system personnel to undertake the program successfully has been assured.

3. Personnel and Facilities

a. The program director has demonstrated competence for administering the type of program proposed.

b. The key program personnel, whether school system staff or outside advisory specialists, have demonstrated competence for conducting the work under consideration.

c. The supplies, resource materials, equipment, and facilities available to, or to be obtained by, the institution or agency submitting the application are adequate to carry out the program.

4. Economic Efficiency

a. The relationship between the value of the anticipated outcome and the total cost of the proposed program is favorable.

b. The suggested approach to the problem is reasonable in terms of overall cost as compared with the cost of other possible approaches.

c. Cooperative planning and operation with nearby school systems or institutions of higher education has been effected, where possible, to bring about a maximum utilization of resources with maximum efficiency.

d. Itemized costs in the proposal are realistic.

e. The proposed program is one that is conducted in addition to a regular program in the school system of the applicant.

f. The ratio of Federal funds requested to the total cost of the proposed program is reasonable in view of the nature of the problem, the financial condition of the applicant, and other resources available to it.

II. Administration of Grants

A. Award of Grant

1. Notification and Acceptance

The applicant will be notified in writing of the disposition of the application. If the Commissioner makes a grant, the grant award letter will indicate the approved budget and grant conditions, which will include the terms and conditions outlined in this manual of policies and procedures. Each grant is assigned a number which is indicated in the grant award letter. All subsequent communications concerning the grant should make reference to this number.

The applicant shall indicate acceptance of the proposed grant by having the authorized official sign the original and three copies of the grant award letter and by returning the three copies within ten days to:

Equal Educational Opportunities Program
U.S. Office of Education
400 Maryland Avenue, S.W.
Washington, D.C. 20202

If the grant is not accepted, all copies of the grant award letter should be returned to the above address within ten days with a cover letter indicating such action.

2. Payment of Grants

The first payment on a grant is generally made within approximately two weeks after the grant award letter copies, duly signed by the grantee, have been received by the Office of Education. Monthly payments, after the initial payment, are made in accordance with the needs of the grantee as specified in the grant award letter, contingent upon receipt of satisfactory fiscal and progress reports as outlined under the section "Records and Reports." The schedule of payments will be adjusted according to the needs shown in such reports from the grantee. A final payment in the amount of ten percent (10%) of total Office of Education support will be paid after submittal of the required number of duplicated final reports.

B. Changes in Grant Provisions

Substantial changes from the project as approved must be submitted as an application for a new grant. Changes not substantial in nature may be made in the scope of the work if such changes are mutually acceptable to the Office of Education and are approved in writing. Other permissible changes by the grantee which do not require prior approval shall be limited to changes in methods, approach, or other aspects of the program that would expedite achievement of the program's objective, including changes that grow out of the approved program and serve the best professional procedures.

Adjustments may be made among the amounts of the various items in the budget if the total amount of the grant is not increased. Approval by the Office of Education is required before making a total modification of more than ten percent (10%) in any budget category.

C. Consultant Services

The grantee agrees to determine whether or not any consultant to be utilized in conjunction with a program supported under an Equal Educational Opportunities Program grant has in effect an agreement with the Office of Education for similar services at a lesser consultant rate than that offered under the grant and, if so, to advise the Equal Educational Opportunities Program office accordingly.

D. Use of Funds

Any funds granted shall be expended by the grantee solely for carrying out the program as approved. This does not prohibit subcontracts with others for essential services, but the grantee may not in whole or in part transfer responsibility for the use of such funds or the conduct of the program to any other person. Such subcontracting should relate to a minor part of the work to be performed and requires specific approval in advance by the Office of Education.

E. Responsibility for Exceeding Grant Funds

Any commitments or expenditures incurred by the grantee in excess of the funds provided by the grant or beyond the termination of the grant shall be the responsibility of the grantee. (See, however, Section H below, "Supplementation of Grants.") Expenditures incurred prior to the effective date of the grant (date of the grant letter) may not be charged against grant funds.

F. Allowable Expenditures

1. Allocation of Costs

The allocation of expenditures by a grantee as between direct and indirect costs shall be in accordance with generally accepted and established accounting practices and in accordance with the same policies and methods that the grantee applies to all its activities whether self-sponsored or supported by contracts or grants. With respect to research, training, experimental, developmental, or pilot programs such allocation shall be in accordance with Bureau of the Budget Circular A-21, as in effect on the date of the grant.

2. Direct Costs

Funds granted for the direct costs of an approved program may be expended by the grantee for categories indicated in the Proposal Format in Section I-J of this manual.

3. Indirect Costs

In most cases it will be expected that the grantee will contribute indirect costs as part of its share of program support. In cases of special need, however, indirect costs may be allowed under the grant.

The amount awarded for indirect costs is provided for the purpose of meeting the approved program's share of the general administrative and other overhead expenses of the grantee. Indirect costs are those which, because of their incurrence for common or joint objectives are not readily identified with individual programs. Expenditures representing an institution's auxiliary services or supportive activities, such as personnel management, accounting, or purchasing, and the cost of the utilities or the normal maintenance and protection of the grantee's facilities, shall not be charged as direct costs, unless because of special circumstances such a charge is specifically approved in advance of the expenditures. The amount that may be paid for indirect costs is the actual indirect costs not to exceed 20 percent of the direct costs. The grantee will be expected to furnish justification to warrant the indirect cost rate requested. Justification shall be on the basis of an audit by an agency of the Government or by public accountants.

G. Termination of Grants

1. Termination by the Grantee

A grantee may at any time terminate or cancel its conduct of an approved program by notifying the Commissioner in writing setting forth the reasons for such termination.

2. Termination by the Commissioner

Any grant award may be terminated, in whole or from time to time in part, by the Commissioner whenever for any reason he finds that such termination is in the best interest of the Government. Termination of the grant shall be effected by delivery to the grantee of a notice of termination specifying the extent to which the grant is terminated, the reasons therefore, and the date upon which such termination becomes effective.

3. Accounting

Upon termination of the grant, the grantee shall cancel its outstanding commitments thereunder covering the procurement of materials, supplies, equipment, and miscellaneous items. In addition, the grantee shall exercise all reasonable diligence to accomplish the cancellation or diversion of its outstanding commitments covering personal services extending beyond the date of such termination, to the extent that they relate to the performance of any work under the subject grant.

The grantee shall submit his termination claim to the Office of Education promptly after receipt of a notice of termination, but in no event later than one year from the effective date thereof, unless one or more extensions in writing are granted by the Office of Education upon written request of the grantee within such one-year period or authorized extension thereof. Upon failure of the grantee to submit his termination claim within the time allowed, the Office of Education may, subject to any review required by the Office of Education's procedures in effect as of the date of execution of the grant, determine, on the basis of information available to it, the amount, if any due to the grantee by reason of the termination and shall thereupon pay to the grantee the amount so determined.

Subject to the provisions of the paragraph above, and subject to any review required by the Office of Education's procedures in effect as of the date of execution of the grant, the grantee and the Office of Education may agree upon the whole or any part of the amount or amounts to be paid the grantee by reason of the termination, which amount or amounts may include any reasonable cancellation charges thereby incurred by the grantee and any reasonable loss upon outstanding commitments for personal services which it is unable to cancel; provided, however, that in connection with any outstanding commitments for personal services which the grantee is unable to cancel, the grantee shall have exercised reasonable diligence to divert such commitments to its other activities and operations.

H. Supplementation of Grants

A grant for the support of program activities is not to be considered a "cost-reimbursement" contract. In many cases the amount granted by the Office of Education is less than the amount requested by the grantee. The grantee should plan the program within the grant funds unless additional funds are to be obtained from other sources.

If, however, during the course of the grant, an unexpected and unforeseen development occurs of such significance as to place a choice upon the grantee of either terminating or curtailing the undertaking because of the need of additional funds, the Office of Education will consider making a supplemental grant, for direct costs only, at an amount not to exceed 15 percent (15%) of the original grant, but not to exceed $5,000. Requests for supplemental grants will be approved by the Commissioner only if (a) the need for additional funds is occasioned by unforeseen circumstances and (b) the grantee states that it cannot provide such additional funds as part of its contribution to the undertaking. Supplemental grants will not be used to reimburse grantees for expenditures or obligations incurred prior to the application for the supplemental grant. Only one such supplemental payment may be allowed for a given grant.

I. Grantee Accountability

1. Date of Final Accounting

In addition to such other accounting as the Commissioner may require, a grantee shall render, with respect to each approved program a full account, as provided herein, as of a termination date which shall be either (a) the end of the program period or (b) the date of any termination of grant support, whichever first occurs.

2. Accounting for Grant Award Payments

With respect to each approved program, the grantee shall account for the sum total of all amounts paid under P.L. 88-352 by presenting or otherwise making available vouchers or any other evidence satisfactory to the Commissioner of expenditures for allowable direct and indirect costs: Provided, however, that where the amount awarded for indirect costs was based on a percentage of estimated direct costs, the amount allowed for indirect costs shall be that percentage of actual direct costs, or approved portion thereof, unless the Commissioner has reason to believe that such application of the percentage would result in an allowance in excess of actual indirect costs.

3. Accounting for Equipment, Materials, or Supplies

Expenditures of grant funds for movable or fixed equipment, materials, or supplies, hereinafter referred to as "materials," may be charged to grant funds as direct costs only to the extent such materials are required for the conduct of the approved program during the program period. Any materials on hand on the date of termination (excluding expendable supplies within such limitations as the Commissioner may prescribe) shall be accounted for, or accountability waived, by one or a combination of the following methods:

a. Retention for Other Similar Programs

The materials may be used, without adjustment of accounts, in other programs within the scope of P.L. 88-352, and no other accounting for such materials shall be required: Provided, however, (1) that during such period of use no charge for depreciation, amortization or for other use of the materials shall be made against any existing or future Federal grant or contract, and (2) if within the period of their useful life the materials are transferred by sale or otherwise for use for purposes outside the scope of P.L. 88-352, the bona fide or fair market value at the time of transfer shall be payable to the United States.

b. Sale or Other Disposition: Crediting of Proceeds or Value

The materials may be sold by the grantee and the net proceeds of sale credited to the grant account for program use, or they may be used and disposed of in any manner by the grantee by crediting to the grant account their fair market value on the termination date. To the extent materials purchased from grant funds have been used for credit or "trade-in" on the purchase of new materials, the accounting obligation shall apply to the same extent to such new materials.

c. Transfer to the United States

To the extent the Commissioner so requires or approves, title to such materials will be transferred to the United States for such authorized use or disposition as he may direct.

4. Interest

Any interest earned through any deposit or investment by the grantee of the funds paid pursuant to P.L. 88-352 shall be paid to the United States as such interest is received by the grantee.

5. Project Net Income

Except as may otherwise be provided pursuant to regulations of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare with respect to income from patentable inventions or discoveries, the Commissioner may impose on any grant award or class of grant awards conditions that will assure return to the United States of its equitable share of any net income derived by the grantee from the activity supported by grant funds.

6. Final Settlement

There shall be payable to the United States as final settlement with respect to each approved program the total sum of (1) any amount not accounted for pursuant to (2) above, (2) any credits for materials on hand as provided in paragraph (3) above, and (3) any credits for earned interest and for net income of the program pursuant to paragraphs (4) and (5) above. Such payment shall be made by check payable to the U.S. Office of Education and mailed to the Fiscal Management Section. Such settlement may accompany the final report or be made following Federal audit of the grant expenditures.

J. Records and Reports

1. Records

The grantee shall maintain books and records which show all expenditures incurred under the grant, in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles and consistent with the categories of expenses set forth in the grant. The grantee agrees that the Commissioner or his duly authorized representative shall have access to and the right to examine any directly pertinent books, documents, papers, and records of the grantee, in the performance, or, and involving transactions related to, the grant, for a period of three (3) years after final payment under this grant or until audited by representatives of the Commissioner whichever is later.

2. Reports

a. Fiscal Reports

A cumulative report of expenditures is required prior to payment in accordance with the schedule of payments indicated in the grant award letter. A final fiscal report shall be submitted within 90 days of the end of the grant award period or the termination of the grant, whichever is earlier.

b. Technical Progress Reports

A brief technical progress report in four copies will be submitted prior to payment in accordance with the schedule of payments indicated in the grant award letter. Each report will include a brief description of the scope of the program; work completed during the reporting period; plans for the next reporting period; unanticipated problems; and the personnel paid from grant funds. In those cases where a program has been tentatively approved for grant support extending beyond the award period (See Section I-G.), the progress report submitted, in the fourth month prior to the beginning of the new fiscal year shall, in addition to the information requested above, contain a proposed budget for the new fiscal year or part thereof, as is appropriate to the terms of the original grant. This proposed budget shall follow the format indicated in this manual of policies and procedures. If no change is desired from the budget for the new fiscal year, as it was submitted in the original proposal and approved contingent upon the appropriation of funds by the Congress, a statement to this effect may be submitted in lieu of a new budget proposal.

c. Special Reports

Special reports shall be submitted upon request by the Office of Education.

d. Final Technical Report

Within 90 days of the end of the grant award period or the termination of the grant, whichever is earlier, the grantee shall provide the Office of Education with twenty-five (25) duplicated copies of a final report and an additional twenty-five (25) copies of the abstract contained therein.

(1) Content: Because of the diversity of programs supported, it is not possible to prescribe the length or most desirable arrangement of content for a final report. However, the report constitutes a complete report of the program to the Office of Education and to professional colleagues. It should be a sufficiently detailed account to permit the reader to ascertain the significance and validity of the results and to replicate the program, should he wish to do so.

(2) Format: The final report should be duplicated on standard white paper stock, 8½" by 11", bound with an inexpensive, but durable, paper cover.

(3) Cover: On the cover of the report will appear the following:

(a) (The title by which the project is known)

(b) (Author)

(c) Grant-to-School-Board Number_____
P.L. 88-352, Title IV, Section 405
The Civil Rights Act of 1964

(d) (The name of the Program Director if different from author)

(e) (The imprint of the grantee)

(f) The Project Reported Herein Was Supported by a Grant from the U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
Office of Education

(4) Abstract: The abstract of the final report should be approximately 600 words in length and in general follow the outline below:

(a) Identification (Items (a), (b), (c), (d), and (f) of (3) above)

(b) Purpose

(c) Procedure

(d) Results and Conclusions

e. Acknowledgment of Federal Support

The grantee shall provide the U.S. Office of Education with 25 reprints of any article published resulting from the activity of the program prior to the conclusion of the grant. Such articles or other publications resulting from or primarily related to program activity supported by a grant shall contain the following:

The development of the program activities reported herein was supported by a grant from the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Office of Education.

K. Grants for Continued Support

When a subsequent proposal requesting continued support is approved, a new grant will be activated. Although special arrangements for voiding the requirement for a technical report on the original grant may be made, it will be necessary for the grantee to submit a final fiscal report at a time when such final fiscal report can reflect full accounting of all funds expended under the original grant. Normally, expenditures under the new grant should not begin until funds from the previous grant are fully expended or committed. If the funds for the second grant are received prior to the time that the funds from the first grant are exhausted, work under the first grant should be considered completed on the day when funds are fully expended or committed. New accounts should be established for the second grant in order that the recording and reporting of expenditure may be separated.

L. Clearance of Forms

In the event the work performed under a grant for in-service training program operation involves the collection of identical information from ten or more individuals or organizations, other than Federal employees or agencies, the contractor or grantee should submit to the Equal Educational Opportunities Program office six copies of all questionnaire forms and survey plans for transmittal to the Bureau of the Budget for approval prior to their use, in accordance with the Federal Reports Act of 1942.

M. Patents

In order to effectuate the general policies of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare with respect to the utilization of the results of research, experimental, developmental, or pilot programs, supported by grants of public monies (45 CFR, Parts 6 and 8) as amended, any inventions arising out of the activities assisted by the grant shall be promptly and fully reported to the Commissioner. Rights in any invention shall be determined by the Commissioner as follows:

1. If he finds that there is adequate assurance that the invention will either be effectively dedicated to the public, or that any patent which may be obtained thereunder will be generally available for royalty-free and nonexclusive licensing, the effectuation of these results may be left to the grantee.

2. If he finds that the invention will thereby be more adequately and quickly developed for widest use and that there are satisfactory safeguards against unreasonable royalties and repressive practices, the invention may be assigned to a competent organization for development and administration for the term of the patent or such lesser period as may be deemed necessary.

3. If he finds that the interest of another contributing Government agency is paramount to the interest of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, or when otherwise legally required or in the public interest, the invention may be left for disposition by that agency in accordance with its own policy.

4. In all other cases, he shall require that all domestic rights in the invention shall be assigned to the United States unless he determines that the invention is of such doubtful importance or the Government's equity in the invention is so minor that protective measures, except as provided in the following paragraph, are not necessarily in the public interest.

Any arrangement or determination as to the disposition of rights in inventions, as stated above, shall require that there be reserved under any patent application or patent thereon, domestic or foreign, a nonexclusive, irrevocable, royalty-free license to the Government with power to sublicense for all governmental purposes.

In any case where it is determined that all domestic rights should be assigned to the Government, there shall be reserved to the Government, pursuant to Executive Order 9865 and Government-wide regulations issued thereunder, an option to require the assignment of all rights in the invention in all or in any specified foreign countries.

N. Copyrights

Any data, materials, or other information which may be developed or created in connection with the activity assisted by the grant shall be, during the term of this grant and thereafter, so long as it remains in the possession of the grantee, available for study and utilization by the Commissioner and such persons or organizations as the Commissioner may designate. Materials which are properly confidential shall be treated as such.

The grantee shall be free to publish the results of its work under the grant so long as copyrights protection is secured on any such data, materials, or other information that is copyrightable prior to or upon publication or so long as the Commissioner has first approved in writing publication without claim to copyright protection: Provided, that the Government reserves the rights to require that any copyright obtained on any such data, materials, or other information be assigned to the Government or any other designee of the Commissioner.

There shall be reserved to the Government, and to its officers, agents, and employees, acting within the scope of their duties, a nonexclusive, irrevocable, royalty-free license throughout the world, to publish, translate, reproduce, use, and dispose of (and to authorize others to do) all such data, materials, or other information which is copyrightable.

The grantee agrees to report promptly to the Office of Education the publication of any such data, materials, or other information, including the place, date, and manner of publication.

The grantee agrees to report to the Commissioner promptly and in reasonable written detail any notice or claim of copyright infringement received by the grantee with respect to any data, materials, or other information which may be developed or created under the grant.

O. Safety Precautions

As Office of Education grants are made to provide financial support to grantees in their program undertakings, the Office cannot assume any liability with respect to accidents, illnesses, or claims arising out of any work undertaken with the assistance of the grant. The grantee is advised to take such steps to insure or protect itself as may be deemed desirable.

P. Other Conditions

The Commissioner may with respect to any grant award impose additional conditions prior to or at the time of any award when in his judgment such conditions are necessary to assure or protect advancement of the approved program, the interests of education, or the conservation of grant funds.

UPLAND INSTITUTE

A PROGRAM FOR SOCIAL CONFLICT MANAGEMENT

Bulletin 1965

THE UPLAND INSTITUTE

History and Purpose

The Upland Institute has been organized to help meet the urgent need for trained leadership required by social welfare, government agencies, social action, peace and civil rights groups.

The program of the Institute rests upon three concepts: (1) social change is inevitable in our complex society, (2) such change can be achieved without reliance upon violence, (3) the intellectual capacities and resources rooted in man's secular and religious heritage can be utilized in training men and women for leadership in nonviolent social change.

The objective of the Institute is to prepare its students to meet the challenge of change in their own communities and in the world community. Its educational plan offers an experiential approach to training directed to these ends.

The Upland Institute is co-educational and open to students without regard to race or creed. It welcomes men and women willing to work hard and deeply interested in exploring the field of social change and social conflict, with serious intention of giving some time to professional or volunteer service in some area of social change. Since all courses will be presented on a graduate level, an A.B. degree is desirable but not a requirement for admission. The Institute is prepared to evaluate the education and experience of any applicant, to determine his readiness to undertake the Institute's intensive course of study and training. Significant experience in some area of social conflict is desirable.

Early experiments in curriculum and field work by the staff of the New York Friends Group have been reviewed and tested with representatives of religious, educational, civil rights, community and peace agencies. Experimental seminars have been held over a two-year period in New York, Boston, Chicago and San Francisco.

As a result of this consultation and experimentation, decisions were made to seek a permanent graduate educational setting for the further development of this program. In December 1964, agreements were reached with the Crozer Foundation at Chester, Pennsylvania, to establish the Upland Institute and open classes in September 1965, using the campus and facilities of the Crozer Theological Seminary, one of a number of constituent institutions operating under the Crozer Foundation.

The Institute takes its name from historic Upland, one of the earliest settlements on the Delaware River, later renamed Chester, 13 miles south of Philadelphia. It is located on the 67 acre campus of the Crozer Foundation in the center of a heavily industrialized metropolitan area of five million people.

The Institute is one of three schools and a medical center, operating as constituent parts of the Crozer Foundation, a charitable, religious, scientific, and educational corporation organized for professional training and community service.

The Institute is under the immediate direction of a Council of Fellows selected for their experience and competence in areas of social change, academic achievement, and interest in the problems of training for conflict management. The Council, in consultation with the staff of the Institute, determines program, implements policy, sets standards, and nominates candidates for the faculty.

THE UPLAND INSTITUTE PROGRAM

The academic year from September to June will require full-time student participation. Upon satisfactory completion of the program, each student will be granted a Certificate of Accomplishment. As the program develops, an M.A. degree may be offered for further work.

An intensive study of the history and process of social change will be presented through seminars, individual projects, and reading programs. Extensive field work experience in areas of social conflict will permit each student to develop skills in his areas of special interest. Enrollment will be limited to fifteen students to provide full opportunity for individual instruction.

AREAS OF STUDY

Seminars and courses will be given on such topics as:

Structure and Change in Modern Society, a study of the characteristics of contemporary society, the problems inherent to this type of culture and the basic social processes, institutions and mechanisms of social change.

Movements of Social Protest, including the Freedom Movement, peace education and action, trade unionizing, etc. This will include a critical evaluation of the problems faced in these areas and the techniques used in attempting to solve these problems.

Organizing and Building Programs for Social Change in the local community with emphasis on the use of both voluntary and governmental organizations, (political parties, labor unions, human relations commissions, health and welfare councils, etc.) as well as methods of organizing and conducting nonviolent protest movements. This would include emphasis on practical work skills.

The Individual and the Changing Community, an exploration of the importance of personal attitudes, motivations, ethical and religious insights, and how these affect the individual's ability to work for constructive social change. Extensive use will be made of case histories.

Methods of Action Research, an attempt will be made to develop skills in surveying communities and observing agents of social change. It will emphasize the techniques of reducing biased and distorted understanding.

Concept and Practice of Nonviolence, a consideration of the theory and techniques of nonviolent action as a means of effecting constructive social change.

REFUSE TO TORTURE AND KILL

FIELD WORK PROGRAM

Each student will undertake a field work assignment with some social agency or action group actively involved in effecting social change. The student will spend an average of three days a week in field work. There will be opportunities to work with civil rights groups, peace organizations, and other social agencies in Chester and in the nearby cities of Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore and Washington. The student is expected to participate fully in the work and program of the group to which he is assigned. Field work assignments will be guided by the Director of Field Work, who will confer regularly with each student. Participation in regularly scheduled field work seminars and written reports on their field experience will be required.

The objective of the field work program is to provide first-hand experience in social action; experience in organizational work; to develop particular skills and abilities in organizational work; and to experience the tension inevitably existing between the vision and the reality of any social action movement.

EXTENSION PROGRAM

In addition to the one-year program, provision will be made for short-term special training projects. In response to requests from local communities or organizations, the Institute will make provision for groups of selected leaders to come to the campus for short periods of intensive training in techniques of nonviolent social change.

The Upland Institute also plans to offer special short-term training courses to meet particular needs as they become evident. The Institute's teaching staff and facilities will be available to plan, develop, and conduct special training courses on or off campus, to help meet the needs for trained leadership of any social action group or of a particular community. Institute faculty members will be available to advise organizations on development of in-service training programs.

CERTIFICATE

Upon satisfactory completion of the full program of study and field work, each student will be granted a Certificate of Accomplishment. As the Institute's program develops, an M.A. degree may be offered, upon completion of a more extensive program of study and field training.

The Institute is not at present an accredited school, but preliminary steps have been taken toward accreditation.

FACULTY

JOHN W. THOMAS, Director of Studies

Dr. Thomas has had a long history of concern for and involvement in social change. This dates back to the evacuation of Japanese-Americans from the west coast during World War II, when he represented the American Baptist Convention in the relocation of evacuees and was chairman of the National Student Relocation Council. For five years he served as Executive Secretary of the Council on Christian Social Progress of the American Baptist Convention and for six years was chairman of the Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches. Education in a Changing Society

By Bayard Rustin

WE FIND OURSELVES in perilous and rapidly changing times, which demand that we re-examine and even give up some of our old, obsolete rigidities. But far more important, these are times that test the seriousness of our attachment to those values which are indispensable to the survival of a civilized and democratic tradition.

We are neither the first people nor the first generation to be so confronted—although it is the habit of most generations to see themselves in crisis, to imagine that their experience is without precedent in history. I am reminded, for example, of mid-19th century Europe—its traditional certainties shattering in the face of revolutionary discoveries and ideologies in science, industry, religion, and politics. In England Matthew Arnold, like John Dewey an educational theorist and man of letters, viewed the crisis of his old order as "a darkling plain, swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight, where ignorant armies clash by night."

Today we can afford to hold Arnold's poetry in higher regard than his "aristocratic" premonitions of doom. For though he was considered a humanist and liberal thinker of his time, by the standards of our time he was a conservative. He would certainly have collapsed at the thought of a trade union movement existing in England. His sympathies remained closer to the genteel agonies of the classes than to the dreadful problems of the masses. Like some of the strange liberals of our own day, too, he could attack with equal passion both the excesses of his country's colonial administrators in the West Indies and the passage of the 1867 Reform Bill at home.

Nor can we share the distress Arnold felt at the advance of new styles of thought and belief upon his tradition-bound society. For many of those ideological innovations have since nourished the growth of a radical humanism and made possible a greater measure of social justice and progress in our own time.

But if we cannot sympathize with the politics of Arnold's judgment, neither can we ignore the quality of his anguish. The connection he felt to values of his time was perhaps as close as the connection we feel to some of ours. The visions he entertained of "ignorant armies clashing by night," are precisely the fears that are racking our society today. I think, however, that our fears are more real and more justified—because the values for whose survival we are now concerned spring from a more democratic tradition; a tradition which, though imperfect, we cannot afford to scrap; a tradition much closer to the egalitarian sentiments of John Dewey than to the qualified and genteel liberalism of Matthew Arnold.

Leaving aside those differences, one thing both Arnold and Dewey would agree upon is the importance of the role teachers play in insuring the survival of the more attractive traditions of their society. And I cannot overestimate the seriousness of the challenge now faced by our schools not only to preserve democratic education, but also to fertilize the growth of democratic citizenship among all Americans. It is a challenge that arises out of racial, political, technological, economic, and social demands more serious than any Dewey was ever asked to contemplate. Yet we can seek and perhaps find guidance in his example; for he was a tireless experimenter, a man who was neither rigid in his determinations nor determined to be rigid.

The chief task now, it seems to me, is for teachers and educationists to insure quality education, to foster the ideal of communication and compassion among all the young people of our society, and to view the teaching process as an integral part of the effort to bring about social change and social justice. This can be done only when the educational community is prepared, like Dewey, to innovate, to be flexible, to be imaginative in the application of educational philosophy.

MORE CONCRETELY, I would like to touch upon a few realities and strategies that must be of serious concern to teachers and teachers unions if they are to help keep Arnold's "ignorant armies" apart, and if they are to be more responsive and relevant to the complex demands of our society at the present time.

1. The teachers union is more than simply an instrument for seeking and obtaining redress of professional grievances. It happens also to belong to the American labor movement, and therefore it becomes a part of that tradition in America which has historically been committed to the cause of social justice and equal economic opportunity.

I would be the first to admit that, as in every American institution, discrimination continues to exist in the trade union movement. Nevertheless, it has made outstanding contributions to the economic advancement of millions of blacks and whites in this country. The trade union movement was an indispensable part of the coalition that helped shape and achieve the New Deal—transforming this nation at an earlier period, and assuring the continued right of both blue and white collar workers to organize. In spite of vestiges of injustice, the trade union movement is more integrated than our schools, our churches, and American industry. It was one of the vital elements of the civil rights coalition of the early 1960s, the most vigorous lobbyist in behalf of civil rights and voting rights legislation. And even now it is the only mass institution in our society that is making the social and economic demands which, if enacted, will eradicate poverty.

Thus no arm of the trade union movement, whether it be teachers or office workers, can disassociate itself from that tradition of social concern or from the activities being carried out to win new objectives. What are some of these new objectives? We need a $2 minimum wage, a guaranteed income, public works for socially urgent institutions, free medical care, destruction of slums, creation of new towns, increased Federal aid, and reorganization of the school system. These are basic demands of the trade union movement, and no religious group, no business group—in fact, no other group in the society—is as dedicated to this program.

Moreover, there is a direct relationship between our social and economic problems and the inability of our teachers to teach or to achieve the best results. Therefore, teachers cannot avoid the struggle to establish more decent communities, better housing, full employment, a higher minimum wage, and a generally more humane environment. It is only when these problems are solved—or begin to appear soluble—that teachers will be able to realize their full effectiveness and their full potential as professionals.

BAYARD RUSTIN

2. Across this nation, in every city and state, teachers are underpaid; the educational bureaucracy is cumbersome; classes are too large; parents are complaining; children are not learning as well as they should; and their teachers are being reduced to clerks, baby sitters and cops. While these problems arise out of the social and economic nature of the society, they are exacerbated by the sterile bureaucracy of Boards of Education as well as the refusal of the state and Federal governments to appropriate enough money, or provide adequate facilities, for the school systems. All of this illustrates how adept the educational bureaucracy is at applying the strategy of "divide and rule."

In a situation where children are not learning, parents and teachers enter into a very unfortunate vendetta. Yet they are precisely the ones who should form a powerful coalition against the educational bureaucracy to demand the facilities they need. This, then, is a new imperative: No effort should be spared to create a coalition between teachers, trade unions, and parent groups to make the educational authorities more accountable and responsive to the needs of students, the demands of parents, and the problems of teachers.

3. I am aware, of course, that there are limits to what coalitions can do in the struggle to bring about integrated education and a better school system. At those limits teachers unions must introduce certain revolutionary strategies in their collective bargaining arrangements in order to literally wrest concessions from the dead hands of the authorities.

Let me try to illustrate. In 1964, a coalition of Negro and Puerto Rican parents, along with a number of liberal groups, made a strong and bold demand for quality integrated education for their children. The first dramatic expression of that demand came in the form of the 1964 school boycott, which the Reverend Milton Galamison and I organized. Half a million children stayed home, shutting down the New York City school system. A few months later, the Reverend Galamison led another boycott, and some 40 per cent of the children stayed out of school. Subsequently, the NAACP, CORE and other civil rights organizations sponsored a march on City Hall in which, once again, the demand was for quality integrated education.

Well, what did we get? Nothing, really. Only a series of meaningless plans and statements from the Board of Education aimed simply at catching and deceiving public attention. In addition, we also got spectacular sounding proposals for bussing, pairing, 4-4-4, etc. But all of this did nothing. The inadequacies of the school system remained fundamentally unmet and unchanged. Classes were still overcrowded. Teachers were still overburdened and, in many instances, untrained and unprepared. The curricula were still defective and inappropriate to the needs of thousands of Negro and Puerto Rican children. We were, in fact, no closer to quality integrated education than we were when the great civil rights effort began.

The lessons—at least, to me—were clear. Public protest alone would not get us anywhere. We needed a silent partner in this effort—the teachers union. And the teachers union's role in that partnership would be of mutual benefit to parents, children, and the teachers themselves. What would the union do? Just this: Make the issue of quality educational facilities one of the major bargaining points at contract negotiations. In other words, get the demands written into their contracts.

I made exactly that point in 1966 when I addressed the annual convention of the American Federation of Teachers, so I was glad when the United Federation of Teachers, the largest affiliate of the AFT, achieved a significant measure of success in this direction during their negotiations with the New York Board of Education last year. All teachers unions should now move to incorporate demands for quality educational facilities into their basic negotiating strategies.

4. I spoke earlier of the need for flexibility and imagination; of the courage to give up rigid postures which, though they might be comforting, are no longer attractive, creative or feasible. Indeed, they now merely hinder rather than advance progress. At the same time, I spoke of the courage to defend and maintain those principles which are indispensable to the survival of civility and a democratic texture in our relationships.

THERE ARE a number of demands being made on teachers today that challenge both their courage to be flexible and their courage to remain faithful to high ideals. I will try to deal with just two of these demands. The first one is flexibility. It asks recognition of the fact that Negro children in this society—and white children also—are being taught biased, edited, and ultimately racist versions of American history and culture. It is not enough to pay lip service to the idea of racial harmony and equality: The Negro must refuse any longer to accept the distorted view of his roots and his past in this country.

As taught in our textbooks, this history reinforces in white children the notion that they are superior and the only creators of this country; and it reinforces in black children the notion that they are inferior and have made no contributions. It may be true that most blacks came here as slaves, but the first of them were here as free men, and gave their lives in the struggle to win independence for this nation. They fought as well as anyone else during the Civil War; they played their part in the opening of the American West; they helped plan and lay out some of our major American cities; they developed the only indigenous form of American music; they made notable contributions to scientific research; they are to be found in the growth and development of the American musical and dramatic stage; and the best of their writing ranks with the best that has been done in America. This is by no means all, but then I am by no means an historian. In any case, the question is not whether they should have done more. The miracle is that they did so much in the circumstances of their history.

It is because of racism, it is because the dominant value judgments in this society are white, and it is because a consistently poor estimate has been placed on the quality and extent of Negro effort—for all these reasons the true story of the Negro in America is not told in our history books. And for all these reasons historians continue to tell lies, continue to avert their eyes, continue to retard the progress of civility, decency, and human dignity in our society. It is time to give up that old rigid stance. However comforting it may be to some, it is a delusion, and it is a violation of the right of all young minds to know the truth and to be free.

Organized teachers can play a major role in the effort to liberate American history books. They can join those who are making an effort to bring truth into the schools through a total revision of the textbooks. Where good texts are not in existence, teachers must bring in supplementary material to their classes. They themselves can make studies of Negro history and culture.

The second great demand now being made by both white and black extremists is that we surrender our time-honored dedication to the idea of integration and substitute various forms of separation. I do not have to detail the reasons for this demand: It is being made in the name of community participation, in the name of community control, in the name of quality education, and in the name of several other interests. But ultimately, whether the groups mean it or not, the demand is being made in the name of segregation.

Regardless of some of the good arguments in favor of decentralization, that concept cannot be discussed independently of the implications it has for institutionalizing one of the worst evils in the history of this society—segregation. While I am prepared to recognize that some measure of decentralization is feasible and perhaps desirable, I would proceed very carefully, because we may end up creating and worsening more problems than we solve.

Some of the positive aspects of the proposal to decentralize are: (1) it reflects a concern for the present state of education in our public schools; (2) it promises to bring parents in closer touch with the process of education; (3) it could foster closer unity between teachers and parents in some communities, and enable them together to affect educational programs and policies; and (4) it could make teachers more responsive to some of the special needs and special problems of certain communities.

But there are also some real dangers. First, the proposal seems concerned more with political self-determination in education than with quality in education. Second, it is meaningless to promise communities control without also promising them the funds to make this control effective. If political control is not complemented by financial control, it may ultimately lead merely to an increase in community frustrations. Third, there is a real danger of community school boards being taken over by extremist groups—black and white, on the Right and on the Left—who are less interested in education than in racial and community politics. The education of children is much too important to be subverted to such interests. Fourth, after all the years of our struggle, we are now being asked to accept the idea that segregated education is in fact a perfectly respectable, perfectly desirable, and perfectly viable way of life in a democratic society.

Needless to say, I do not accept this. Therefore, I support a measure of decentralization in which the school districts would be sufficiently broad to include as wide a degree of quality integrated education as possible. In other words: Integration Within Decentralization.

I know that taking such a position leaves me open to harsh criticism from segregationists, both black and white. To the extent that the UFT holds similar views, it will come in for similar criticism.

IT IS AT this point, however, that the second kind of courage I spoke of comes into play: the courage to remain faithful to those ideals which are good, and which are indispensable to the kind of society we want to create. Teachers must stand firmly on the principle that America is a democratic pluralist society. Teachers must reject all forms of educational separatism and elitism. Teachers must become militant integrationists.

In conclusion, let me quote from the Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, one of the most serious pronouncements ever made on the state of American society. On the question of public education, the Report states:

"We have cited the extent of racial isolation in our urban schools. It is great and it is growing. It will not easily be overcome. Nonetheless, we believe school integration to be vital to the well-being of this country. We have seen in this last summer's disorders the consequences of racial isolation, at all levels, and of attitudes toward race, on both sides, produced by three centuries of myth, ignorance and bias. It is indispensable that opportunities for interaction between races be expanded. The problems of this society will not be solved unless and until our children are brought into a common encounter and encouraged to forge a new and more viable design for life."

The problems in our schools and the problems in our society will ultimately be solved through political action. Teachers have no choice but to organize and join the coalition of forces necessary to get programs and money out of Congress. Teachers are uniquely qualified to be part of this coalition, because they know the problems as well as any other group in our society, and better than most.

This means that teachers must play something other than a 9:00-3:00 role: They must have empathy with the problems and conditions of the communities in which they serve. Finally, if they have faith in the ability of children to learn, then those children, whatever their background and circumstance, will in fact learn. This calls for the willingness to be compassionate, to innovate, to experiment, and to be imaginative. It is a willingness that John Dewey, were he among us today, would have welcomed as an endorsement and an enlargement of the pragmatic and democratic educational philosophy he espoused.

Dear Friend,

Enclosed are three articles I thought you might find interesting -- additional copies, should you require them, are available from the Randolph Institute. I think they touch upon such vitally important issues as anti-semitism in the Negro community, education, and the political vaccum caused by the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The Institute has two other pamphlets available: the first is a Spanish-English edition of our pamphlet, "Right to Work" Laws -- A Trap for America's Minorities. This edition has been co-authored by Cesar Chavez, President of the United Farm Workers, and it pays particular attention to the problems of Mexican-Americans and farm workers. We can let you have a large number of free copies if you pay postage. The second is a very interesting pamphlet by Sandra Feldman on the controversial and important problem of decentralization of the New York City schools. It is called Decentralization and the City Schools. It is available at no cost and in limited quantities.

We wish you a pleasant summer and it is just possible that we'll be in touch with you again before the fall.

Best wishes,

For the children of the migrant worker, a life of insecurity.

INTRODUCTION

This last decade has witnessed steady increases in mechanized agriculture and in concentrated farm ownership. Small family farmers, forced off their land, have joined a rising unemployed and underemployed farm labor force, swollen to even larger proportions by the presence of an almost unlimited supply of foreign contract farm workers.

Recognizing the deleterious effects of these foreign workers on the employment opportunities, wages, and working conditions of domestic farm workers, Congress voted, in December of 1963, to terminate Public Law 78 (the Mexican contract farm labor program) on December 31, 1964, thus providing employers of braceros with a year in which to develop plans for recruiting domestic workers.

Three months have elapsed since the termination of Public Law 78 and since the adoption, by the United States Department of Labor, of standards regulating the wages and working conditions of all farm workers hired by would-be employers of foreign contract labor under Public Law 414 (the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952). It is under this Act that Japanese and Filipinos have been contracted for seasonal employment in California, Canadians in a few New England states, and from 10 to 14 thousand British West Indians annually in Florida and other east coast states.

These standards were adopted to provide farm employment, under improved wages and working conditions, for a vast number of unemployed domestic workers. Given these improved conditions, the Administration felt that domestic workers would be available in sufficient numbers to preclude the necessity for importing foreign workers. And to further ensure an adequate supply of seasonal workers, a massive domestic recruitment program was undertaken by the Department of Labor.

Many large growers in several states, notably California and Florida, vigorously opposing both the edict of Congress and the standards established by the Department of Labor, have used every device short of outright refusal to accept domestic workers in an effort to discredit the Labor Department's recruitment efforts. Americans, they allege, have not responded in sufficient numbers to meet their needs; those recruited are unable or unwilling to do the work and do not remain on the job; labor shortages exist everywhere, and crop losses are enormous.

Typifying this attitude is a recent publication of Florida Citrus Mutual, "A Case History of Failure & Losses to Florida Agriculture," which purports to prove "that the indiscriminate recruiting of the Labor Department cannot solve our problems . . . or theirs."

Evidence refuting the claims of Florida Citrus Mutual comes from many sources. Domestic farm workers and on-the-scene observers report systematic discouragement of workers who respond to recruitment efforts, and absolute refusal, on the part of many growers, to comply with prescribed wages and working conditions.

Labor Secretary Wirtz, returning from a four-day, on-the-spot investigation of California's farms, observed that "the most serious reports of labor turnover came from farm operations where conditions were bad, and the fewest complaints from places that obviously were well operated." His words were echoed by a prominent Florida farmer who has never used offshore workers: "I've never had a labor problem. Maybe that's because labor comes first here. I try and put up a good product but not at the expense of the poverty, misery and suffering of my workers."

This brief report presents facts in answer to the allegations of many corporate growers. Though confined to the situation in Florida, the evidence is equally applicable to other states where foreign labor has been in widespread use.

The National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor has prepared this report in the public interest, with the belief that when all the facts are known the American people will act to protect domestic farm workers. Further, we believe the facts show that no labor shortages will exist, and no crops spoil, when growers in this country finally face up to their own responsibility for meeting their labor needs in a competitive market, and to the need for substantial improvements in the wages and working conditions of America's most deprived workers, our hired farm laborers.

"... CONSTANTLY IMPROVING WAGES, WORKING CONDITIONS ..."

(states Florida Citrus Mutual on behalf of the Florida agricultural industry)

HERE ARE THE FACTS:

More Than a Decade of Depressed Wages

... Average hourly farm wages for the state of Florida as a whole rose, between 1951 and 1961, from 63 cents to 86 cents. In contrast, the country-wide hourly farm labor average rose from 77 cents in 1951 to 99 cents in 1961.

... During the same 10-year period wages paid by the major Florida users of foreign agricultural labor increased from 50 cents an hour to 60 cents an hour.

... Basic piece rates for citrus harvest work in 1961 were substantially the same as rates which prevailed in 1951 (for users of foreign labor).

... Between 1962 and 1963 a comparison of the trend in average hourly farm rates of the eight major user states of foreign labor showed:

The 8-state combined average rose 2.9¢ (a 3.9% increase);

In FLORIDA the rate fell 2.6¢ (a 3.5% decrease).

These Background Facts are also Relevant

... During 1962 and 1963 the U. S. Department of Labor, following public field hearings, set adverse effect wage rates in all states using foreign contract labor (a total of 28 states). The Florida rate was established, late in 1962, at 95¢ an hour.

... While growers in all other states accepted the adverse effect wage rates, opposition from Florida growers succeeded in delaying application (by the Labor Department) of this 95¢ rate until July, 1963.

...In October, 1963, following a refusal by Florida growers to guarantee the 95¢ rate, and the application of political pressure, the wage rate was suspended by the USDL. In November of that year a second public hearing was held in Florida to review the facts.

...On the evidence submitted at this second hearing, the 95¢ rate was restored in April, 1964--that is, after the peak period of seasonal labor had already passed.

...During the period from October, 1963 to April, 1964 (the suspension period), wages reverted to their previous level of 60-70¢ an hour.

The Present Wage Picture

...According to the Florida State Employment Service the going rate for potato pickers is six cents a crate. Crates hold 70 to 72 pounds, so to earn a dollar a worker would have to pick 16 crates--slightly more than half a ton of potatoes.

...The U. S. Department of Agriculture has set a wage of $1.15 an hour for unskilled sugar cane field work in Florida. Yet, cane cutters in South Bay were recently found to be receiving piece-rate pay per row, and averaging three to five dollars a day.

This was one of a number of grievances which came to light following a riot, early in March, by Jamaican sugar cane cutters at Okeelanta Camp, where they were housed.

..."A skilled tomato picker can make $15 a day or more....It depends on whether he wants to work."
The Miami Herald - 2/3/65

These were the words of the vice president and general manager of Pearce Produce Company, large-scale growers of tomatoes. Compare them with:

...'I picked my way to fame and fortune in a Krome Avenue tomato field.... The fortune is a little slip of paper...with some numbers scrawled on it. I could have cashed the slip...for $1.20. That was my pay for picking 10 hampers of tomatoes.... 'How many you pick in a good day?' I asked the... man next to me [an experienced picker]. 'Oh, 50, 60, maybe 75 on a real day. But not in a field like this. Frost hit this field. This is poor pickins.'"

The Miami Herald - 2/11/65

These were the words of a Herald reporter who had taken temporary employment in a tomato field "to test the growing controversy over importing foreign laborers."

It takes only elementary arithmetic to show that in order to earn $15 a day at 12 cents a hamper the most skilled worker would have to pick 125 hampers. On the very best of days 75 hampers a day appear to be the maximum possible - with total earnings of $9.00.

...'I was a fruit picker...and I was far better than average, always in the top three in some darn good and large crews. Many times I have picked 100 boxes and over per day....I have made $37.50 per day. Once!! And I have made $4 to $6 per day quite a few times."

letter in The Tampa Tribune - 3/9/65

...'I was a fruit-picker, and this is the way fruit-pickers work. You have to be on the job at 8 in the morning.... You wind up 85 miles from your starting point.... When you get to your destination you may have to hang around an hour and a half until the dew is off the oranges. That would be about noon. Then when you start picking, they know that they have you way-out, so they tell you they are paying 30 cents a box.... You have to travel back to the plant which is another 2 1/2 hours, and you don't get one red cent for travel time. They are telling you they are paying 95 cents an hour...."

letter in The Tampa Tribune - 2/14/65

..."Florida offers... employment in the sunshine. The minimum wage of $1.10 has been fixed. You cannot say it is not adequate compensation...."

Congressman Cramer of Florida - from a House speech 2/18/65.

(Editorial note: The adverse effect wage is now $1.15.)

..."When I read of the plight of citrusmen pleading for fruit pickers... while plenty of able bodied men were available and refusing to work... I was thoroughly disgusted.... But... I've made an about face, being convinced that much of the labor shortage is caused by abuse of pickers. The swill they serve at meals is like the menu of a concentration camp .... The whole setup smells of slave labor...."

"... CONSTANTLY IMPROVING HOUSING CONDITIONS ..."

(states Florida Citrus Mutual on behalf of the Florida agricultural industry)

HERE ARE THE FACTS:

..."In Hastings, Fla., I bunked for two days in a near collapsed, insect-infested shanty for which I was compelled to pay $1.50 a night. Next door in an even more dilapidated hovel lived a married couple whose 2-month old baby had been born there. They paid $10 a week."

Dale Wright - "The Forgotten People"
October, 1961

..."...Somewhere along a 30-mile stretch north of Fort Lauderdale, you turn off onto dirt roads... and run into one of the 90 clusters of shacks in the tall grass where 35,000 migrant workers work during the winter....Mildred Mason - not her real name - and her husband [and two children] live in a one-room shack. There are no windows, only hinged boards. Fleas and flies are so thick nobody troubles to brush them off any more. The only source of heat and cooking is an open fire outside their doorway. Water comes from a pump that serves 11 other shacks...."

Ben H. Bagdikian - "The Invisible Americans"
December, 1963

..."A Belle Glade migrant housing owner said... 'there's a lot of talk about migrants running around and drinking and not staying home, but what kind of homes have they got to stay in?'"

Peter Kramer - St. Petersburg Times
March, 1965

..."There are no camps in Dade County with indoor plumbing for each cabin. The electrical outlet provides a bare bulb for light....Sometimes burlap is the only privacy between rooms. The floors and walls are generally bare, unpainted planks. Families with 10 and 12 children can live in one two-room shack for $8 to $10 a week. The children are bedded down on the floor.... 'A new camp would have to live up to the letter of the law,' says Sanitation Inspector George Folliard. 'That's why there are so few new camps.'"

Clarence Jones - The Miami Herald
March, 1965

..."In the Osceola migrant worker camp...where living conditions were better and less costly than elsewhere, a 67-year old white woman...told a tale.... 'When I came here in 1944...housing (one room, sheet tin shacks without water or bathroom) only cost $1.75 a week.... Now we pay $4.50 a week rent for them tin shelters. They's the same houses we was payin' $1 for 20 years ago except they's older and in worse shape.'" (emphasis added)

"...THIS POSITIVE RECRUITMENT PROGRAM..."

"The Florida Agricultural Industry has made intensive effort to find domestic labor for harvesting work." (states Florida Citrus Mutual)

HERE ARE THE FACTS:

...Despite widespread rural unemployment in surrounding states, the Bureau of Employment Security reports that from 1951 through 1962 clearance orders in Florida remained unfilled because of the unavailability of workers willing to work at the wage rates offered.

Florida, during this period annually employed thousands of British West Indians; peak employment of these off-shore workers, in all but one season, preceded peak domestic employment by one to four months, clearly indicating that they had become the regular work force rather than supplementary labor for periods of domestic shortage.

...Minimum rates on Clearance orders filed with the U.S. Employment Service by the principal employers of foreign agricultural labor rose from 50 cents an hour in 1951 to 65 cents in 1962.

...Congressman Herlong of Florida stated (on the House Floor, 2/18/65): "... [Florida] growers in that area [lower east coast] have largely depended on supplemental foreign workers to efficiently produce and harvest their crops. But when these...growers sought this year to obtain ...foreign workers...they were turned down again and again. I believe that they have a right to expect the Department of Labor to supply qualified and willing workers...."

In no other industry has an employer looked to the Labor Department to solve his manpower problems by supplying him with large numbers of workers, domestic or imported.

He has competed in an open market, and offered the wages and working conditions necessary to assure him of an adequate labor force.

...A foreman for Okeelanta Sugar Company had this to say: "They could get plenty of domestic cutters if they'd pay enough. These Jamaicans and other islanders are no better man for man than our own people.... The owners keep bringing them in to keep the wages down."

St. Petersburg Times - 3/17/65

...Southern Field Representatives for the National Sharecroppers Fund, looking for work opportunities for unemployed farm workers from their areas found:

"I was able to line up several hundred experienced workers who were willing to go to Florida for farm work. On March 17th I went to the local Farm Placement Office and was told that there were no requests from Florida growers for additional workers. Rural people are used to heavy work; many of these men chopped cotton for years. They want farm work, but can't find any."

the Mississippi Field Representative

"... [on March 19th] I got in touch with our Employment Security Commission and talked with the assistant to the Farm Placement Supervisor. He told me that they had already sent 1300 men and women from South Carolina to Florida, to help pick oranges and other fruits and vegetables, and he has sent an additional 800 men to pick tomatoes. He claims that he has had word from Florida that they are pretty well taken care of with migrant workers. We still have thousands who are willing and able to do farm work."

the South Carolina Field Representative

"... THERE IS AN INSUFFICIENT SUPPLY OF DOMESTIC FARM LABOR."

(states Florida Citrus Mutual on behalf of the Florida agricultural industry)

HERE ARE THE FACTS:

In an effort to determine whether or not there was a real labor shortage during February and March, the field representative of the National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor interviewed a number of south Florida individuals familiar with the area and conditions:

..."There is no shortage of vegetable workers. The two migrant camps in Belle Glade are filled almost to capacity, a total of nearly 3,000. The other small, scattered housing units are nearly all filled. Some of the vegetable workers have been getting only two and three days a week. Many of them have been coming in early from the fields--no more work that day.... There is no shortage in the field or in the packing houses...."

--an active member of the Migrant Ministry, Palm Beach County

..."There are plenty of workers in the groves, in vegetables, and in the packing houses....I would say there has been a great publicity campaign across the country on the so-called shortage of agricultural labor. Most of the big growers did not get ready for the end of Public Law 78 and the cut-off of foreign farm workers. They had always pressured the government into a continuance. They believed they could do it again."

--an active member of the Migrant Ministry, South Dade County

..."I can't see any problem here. Our work is mostly in vegetables. There is no shortage in the fields and packing houses....Most of our people are here seven to eight months and things are just about normal."

--a school principal, Collier County

...."This week some of our crews were short. They should average 15 men, but a few had only 5 men. We have 600 men picking this week; of these only 30 are off-shore. Most of our workers are...day-haul, come by bus each day."

--the general manager of a large citrus company, south central Florida

..."I have talked to a number of crew leaders. They feel there is an occasional shortage, but not enough to hurt anything.... Work was good early in the season, then it fell off. People would work three or four days and then be off for several days. It isn't steady, that's the trouble...."

--a Negro minister, Highlands County

..."There is some shortage of cane cutters, but the growers are in part responsible. Hand cutting of cane in this area is a hard, mean, dirty job. The pay scale is about the same for cane cutting as for vegetable workers. If I came into this area to cut cane and found that vegetable workers were making the same money working on a celery machine I wouldn't be satisfied to keep cutting cane."

--statement of a South Florida public official

..."I was a migrant, but I live here all the time now. I get work about eight months.... I do the hoeing and thinning the lettuce.... At night I can be home with my kids.... Lots of people not getting full time. Work some and off some.... I believe there is a shortage of cane cutters, but that is terrible work. They must pay more money for harder work."

--a woman farm worker, Belle Glade

"...A LOSS IN UNHARVESTED FRUIT... DIRECTLY ATTRIBUTABLE TO INSUFFICIENT PICKERS."

(states Florida Citrus Mutual)

HERE ARE THE FACTS:

...'I am advised that harvest of the record large sugar cane crop continues uninterrupted from Florida....I have available data on fresh vegetables for processing, and fresh fruits and vegetables for marketing generally, including the acreage, estimated production, and intentions to plant in the future as a basis for what might happen in the rest of 1965....Our people say that there has not been any dislocation of severe magnitude that could directly or uniquely be attributed to a shortage of labor....I specifically asked...if they knew of any instances in which there had been a drop...failure to harvest and process in the normal fashion that could be pinned directly to labor. Their answer repeatedly was no." (Emphasis added.)

--George L. Mehren, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, before the Senate Committee on Agriculture & Forestry, 1/16/65

...'Prophecies of disaster flow daily from many growers, though none of the prophecies has yet been fulfilled. Despite loud alarums at the first of the year, lettuce growers in California's Imperial Valley harvested their entire crop. The early and midseason harvesting of Florida citrus will be completed by next week with little more than the usual 5-percent loss; Florida found enough workers to replace British West Indians to harvest 5,500,000 boxes of citrus the last week in January, the largest harvest in a week in three years." (Emphasis added.)

--The National Observer - 2/15/65

...'That week there had been a heavy rain one day and violent winds two days later. I asked the guide if the wind had blown off much of the grapefruit. He said, 'Yes, quite a bit. Good thing, too.

There's too much grapefruit and the market is off.'"
--an on-the-scene report from a visitor to a Florida citrus grove - 2/26/65

..."...One claim that has been recently made is that crops...are rotting on the ground, unharvested because domestic labor cannot be found to do the job....Thanks to a reporter for the St. Petersburg Times, Peter Kramer, this spurious claim has been exposed as a half-truth, to put it gently. The facts are, as Mr. Kramer learned while working in the groves himself, that exceptional weather conditions caused the fruit to drop early." (Emphasis added.)
--Congressman Gonzalez, on the House floor - 3/5/65

..."Undersecretary of Labor John F. Henning said yesterday Florida's citrus losses are not due to lack of offshore picking labor....Reports of heavy losses by citrus men because of inadequate labor are not substantiated by information he has received from the USDA....Climatic conditions were responsible for much of the state's claimed citrus losses, and not a shortage of harvesting personnel." (Emphasis added.)
--The Tampa Tribune - 3/13/65

A SHORTAGE OF LABOR OR A SURPLUS OF PRODUCE?

"The immediate and long-range needs of Florida agriculture are for increased numbers of harvesting workers..." (states Florida Citrus Mutual on behalf of the Florida agricultural industry).

There is a considerable body of evidence indicating that the supply of Florida produce already exceeds the demand. There is also evidence indicating present and projected increases in production have been deliberately planned to justify complaints of a labor shortage and demands for increased numbers of workers.

...."Today there is twice as much fruits and vegetables planted in Florida, Texas, Arizona, and California that is needed.... Most of the acreage was planted with the thought in mind of showing Washington there would not be enough labor to harvest the crops planted...."

--excerpt from a letter by an Arizona grower to his Congressman - 1/8/65

..."You know, do you not, that the sugar cane crop in Florida is very greatly increased over what it was last year? You know, too, do you not, that the orange, the grapefruit, and the tangerine crops also are sizably increased over last year, particularly the orange crops?... Those increases run all the way from 40 percent in oranges down to 17 percent in tangerines.... Assuming the correctness of those figures, it is quite obvious that a much greater labor force is going to be required in Florida for the handling of the citrus crop this year." (Emphasis added.)

--excerpts from statements made by Senator Holland at Hearings of the Senate Agriculture Committee - 1/15/65

..."After the Castro take-over in Cuba there has been a great expansion in sugar cane in this area. Some of the boys planted too much. They haven't planned well.... Before Castro there were two sugar mills in Glades. Now there are ten. There is too much cane and not enough cutters...."

--excerpt from a statement by a public official in South Florida

..."More than $1 million in Florida Citrus Commission emergency orange reserve funds yesterday were pledged to bolster what leading industry officials term a sagging market for citrus products.... [Area canners] swore under oath... that a 'serious economic emergency exists.'"

--The Tampa Tribune - 3/11/65

Yet, despite a "sagging market," Florida citrus growers have estimated a production increase from 90 million boxes in 1963 to 230 million boxes by 1975!

The National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor is a voluntary, non-profit organization whose purpose is to gather and disseminate information about the conditions and problems of farm workers, and about farm labor practices and policies.

Through public education on a nationwide scale the Committee seeks to mobilize public opinion and to spark effective action by concerned groups and individuals.

Such action has been enhanced by a number of broadly representative state citizens' committees on farm labor, organized with the help of NACFL. These committees have played an active role in proposing much-needed reforms in state and local farm labor conditions, and have introduced and developed support for both state and federal legislation. To extend these vital activities additional state committees will be formed.

You may write to the NACFL for more information on this subject, for a list of other literature available, and for names and addresses of other groups concerned with this issue.

Abuse of Pickers Brings Pinch

NEW PORT RICHEY—When I read of the plight of citrusmen pleading for fruit pickers as the fruit was lying on the ground and rotting on the trees while plenty of able bodied men were available and refusing to work because they were receiving welfare money and free groceries, I was thoroughly disgusted, and wondered why such conditions should exist. But after reading the experiences of some pickers I've made an about face, being convinced that much of the labor shortage is caused by abuse of pickers.

The swill they serve at meals is like the menu of a concentration camp. While one would not expect steaks or chops at $1.75 per day, it would seem that they could be given an occasional stew, eggs or pancakes. UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965

CCR Special Publication—Number 4

August 1965

"In our system, the first right and most vital of all our rights is the right to vote. Jefferson described the elective franchise as 'the ark of our safety.' It is from the exercise of this right that the guarantee of all our other rights flows.

"Unless the right to vote be secured and undenied, all other rights are insecure and subject to denial for all our citizens. The challenge of this right is a challenge to America itself. We must meet this challenge as decisively as we would meet a challenge mounted against our land from enemies abroad."

President Lyndon B. Johnson
Message to Congress
March 15, 1965

The United States Commission on Civil Rights is a temporary, independent, bipartisan agency established by the Congress in 1957 to:

- Investigate complaints alleging that citizens are being deprived of their right to vote by reason of their race, color, religion, or national origin;
- Study and collect information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution;
- Appraise Federal laws and policies with respect to equal protection of the laws;
- Serve as a national clearinghouse for civil rights information;
- Investigate allegations of vote fraud; and
- Submit interim reports and a final and comprehensive report of its activities, findings, and recommendations to the President and the Congress.

VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965

signed by the President of the United States on August 6, 1965

- Suspends literacy tests and other devices (found to be discriminatory) as qualifications for voting in any Federal, State, local, general or primary election in the States of Alabama, Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Virginia and at least 26 counties in North Carolina.

- Provides for the assignment of Federal examiners to conduct registration and observe voting in States and/or counties covered by the Act.

- Directs the U.S. Attorney General to initiate suits immediately to test the constitutionality of poll taxes because the U.S. Congress found that the payment of such tax has been used in some areas to abridge the right to vote.

- Extends civil and criminal protection to qualified persons seeking to vote and to those who urge or aid others to vote.

This publication is issued by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights as part of its clearinghouse function. It discusses the coverage, administration and other subjects covered by the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The Act is printed on page 10.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 is the fourth bill to be enacted by the U.S. Congress since 1957 that attempts to safeguard the right of every citizen to vote, regardless of his race or color. The previous three legislative measures attempted to secure the right to vote through court cases initiated largely on a case-by-case, county-by-county basis. These cases, brought either by the U.S. Attorney General or an individual, did not adequately meet the dimensions of the problems of racial discrimination in voting.

The 1965 Act provides new tools to assure the right to vote and supplements the previous authority granted by the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960 and 1964. It is intended primarily to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides in Section 1:

> "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The law has two central features:

1. Provision for suspending a variety of tests and devices that have been used to deny citizens the right to vote because of their race or color.
2. Provision for the appointment of Federal examiners to list voters in those areas where tests and devices have been suspended.

In this Act, the term "voting" includes all action necessary—from the time of registration to the actual counting of the votes—to make a vote for public or party office effective.

VOTER REQUIREMENTS OUTLAWED BY THIS ACT

No State or political subdivision (counties, municipalities and parishes) covered by the Voting Rights Act may require the use of any test or device as a prerequisite for registration or voting.

Tests or devices included in this Act are those which require:

1. A demonstration of the ability to read, write, understand or interpret any given material.
2. A demonstration of any educational achievement or knowledge of any particular subject.
3. Proof of good moral character.
4. Proof of qualifications through a procedure in which another person (such as an individual already registered) must vouch for the prospective voter.

COVERAGE

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 states that no person shall be denied the right to vote in any Federal, State or local election (including primaries) for failure to pass a test if he lives in a State or political subdivision which:

1. Maintained a test or device as a prerequisite to registration or voting as of November 1, 1964

and

2. Had a total voting age population of which less than 50 percent were registered or actually voted in the 1964 Presidential election.

If the above two factors are present, the State or political subdivision is automatically covered by the 1965 Act. If an entire State meets these qualifications, all of its counties come under the provisions of the Act. If only one county in a State meets them, the single county is subject to the requirements of the law.

States covered by the Act include Alabama, Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Virginia, and approximately 26 counties in North Carolina.

Cessation of Coverage

A State or political subdivision may be removed from coverage by filing a suit in a three-judge District Court for the District of Columbia. The State or political subdivision must convince the court that no test or device has been used for the purpose or with the effect of denying the right to vote because of race or color during the five years preceding the filing of the suit.

However, if there has been a previous court judgment against a State or political subdivision determining that tests or devices have been used to deny the right to vote, the State or political subdivision must wait five years before it can obtain an order from the District Court for the District of Columbia removing it from the coverage of the Act.

A judgment may be obtained more quickly if the Attorney General advises the court that he believes that the tests have not been used to discriminate on the basis of race or color during the five years preceding the filing of the action. He may also ask the court to reconsider its decision anytime within five years after judgment.

Changes in Voting Laws

When a State or political subdivision covered by the Act seeks to change its voting qualifications or procedures from those in effect on November 1, 1964, it must either obtain the approval of the U.S. Attorney General or initiate a Federal Court suit. If the Attorney General objects to these changes, or if they have not been submitted to him for his approval, the new laws may not be enforced until the District Court for the District of Columbia rules that the changes will not have the purpose or the effect of denying the right to vote because of the race or color of any person.

FEDERAL EXAMINERS

Once it is determined that a political subdivision is covered by the Act, the U.S. Attorney General may direct the U.S. Civil Service Commission to appoint Federal examiners to list voters if:

1. He has received twenty meritorious written complaints alleging voter discrimination, or
2. He believes that the appointment of examiners is necessary to enforce the guarantees of the Fifteenth Amendment.

The times, places and procedures for listing will be established by the Civil Service Commission.

Authority of the Examiners

The Federal examiners will list (that is, declare eligible and entitled to vote) those who satisfy state qualifications that have not been suspended by the Voting Rights Act. Examples of valid qualifications would be those of age and residence.

The examiners will prepare a list of qualified voters and send the list each month to State authorities who must register them—that is, place their names in the official voting records. This list must be available for public inspection. Each person on the examiner's list will be issued a certificate by the examiners as evidence of eligibility to vote in any Federal, State or local election.

No person listed by the examiner will be entitled to vote in any election unless his name has been sent to local election officials at least 45 days before that election thereby allowing the State election machinery to run without complication.

Enforcement of Action by Federal Examiners

At the request of the Attorney General the Civil Service Commission may appoint poll watchers in counties where Federal Examiners are already serving to observe whether all eligible persons are allowed to vote and whether all ballots are accurately tabulated.

If anyone who is properly listed or registered is not permitted to vote in any political subdivision where examiners are serving, a complaint may be made to the examiners of this denial within 48 hours after the polls close. If the examiner believes that the complaint has merit, he must inform the Attorney General immediately. The Attorney General may seek a district court order that provides for the casting of the ballot and suspends the election results until the vote is included in the final count.

Challenge of Listed Persons

A formal objection challenging the qualifications of a person listed by the Federal examiner may be filed (at a place to be designated by the Civil Service Commission) within ten days after the list of qualified voters has been made public and must be supported by at least two affidavits. The validity of the challenge will be determined within fifteen days after filing by a hearing officer appointed by the Civil Service Commission. The U.S. Court of Appeals may review decisions of the hearing officer.

Until the final court review is completed, any person listed by the examiner is still eligible and must be permitted to vote. If a challenge is successful, the name of the registrant will be removed from the examiner's list.

Withdrawal of Federal Examiners

Examiners may be withdrawn from a political subdivision when the names of all persons listed by the examiners have been placed in the official records and when there is no reason to believe that persons in the subdivision will be prevented from voting.

The removal may be accomplished by action of:

1. The Civil Service Commission after it receives notification from the U.S. Attorney General, or
2. The District Court for the District of Columbia in a suit brought by a political subdivision after the Director of the Census has determined that more than 50 percent of the nonwhite voting age population in the subdivision is registered to vote.

A political subdivision may petition the U.S. Attorney General to end listing procedures and to request that the Director of the Census conduct a survey to determine whether more than 50 percent of the nonwhite voting age population is registered.

POLL TAXES

The Act contains a Congressional finding that the right to vote has been denied or abridged by the requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a condition to voting.

The U.S. Attorney General is directed to institute suits against Alabama, Mississippi, Texas and Virginia which require the payment of poll taxes in order to determine if such taxes violate the Constitution. While a suit is pending, or upon a finding that the poll tax is constitutional, persons registered or listed for the first time in areas covered by the Act need only pay the tax for the current year. The poll tax may be paid up to 45 days prior to an election regardless of the timeliness of the payment under State law.

VOTING SUITS

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 gives new enforcement powers to the courts in voting cases. When the court finds that there has been a denial of the right to vote in a suit brought by the U.S. Attorney General, the court must:

1. Authorize the appointment of examiners by the Civil Service Commission unless denials of the right to vote have been few in number, they have been corrected by State or local action, and there is no probability that they will reoccur.
2. Suspend the use of tests or devices in an area where it has been proved that at least one such requirement has been utilized to deny the right to vote because of race or color.

When examiners have been authorized by court order, they may be removed by an order of the authorizing court.

LANGUAGE LITERACY

If a person residing in a State where tests or devices have not been suspended has completed at least six grades in an "American-flag" school (a school in the United States or its territories), his inability to speak the English language shall not be the basis for denying him the right to vote. For example, a person who completed six grades of school in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico but who now resides on the mainland of the United States would satisfy literacy requirements.

CRIMINAL AND CIVIL PENALTIES

Public officials or private individuals who deny persons the right to vote guaranteed by the Voting Rights Act of 1965 or anyone who attempts to or intimidates, threatens, or coerces a person from voting are subject to criminal penalties. It is also made a crime to attempt to or to intimidate, threaten or coerce anyone who urges or aids any person to vote. Criminal penalties are provided for applicants who give false information about their eligibility to vote or who accept payment to register or vote in a Federal election. The U.S. Attorney General is also authorized to bring action for injunctive relief to restrain violations of the Act.

An Act

To enforce the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be known as the "Voting Rights Act of 1965"

Voting Rights Act of 1965.

SEC. 2. No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color.

Judicial remedies.

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the Attorney General institutes a proceeding under any statute to enforce the guarantees of the fifteenth amendment in any State or political subdivision the court shall authorize the appointment of Federal examiners by the United States Civil Service Commission in accordance with section 6 to serve for such period of time and for such political subdivisions as the court shall determine is appropriate to enforce the guarantees of the fifteenth amendment (1) as part of any interlocutory order if the court determines that the appointment of such examiners is necessary to enforce such guarantees or (2) as part of any final judgment if the court finds that violations of the fifteenth amendment justifying equitable relief have occurred in such State or subdivision: Provided, That the court need not authorize the appointment of examiners if any incidents of denial or abridgement of the right to vote on account of race or color (1) have been few in number and have been promptly and effectively corrected by State or local action, (2) the continuing effect of such incidents has been eliminated, and (3) there is no reasonable probability of their recurrence in the future.

(b) If in a proceeding instituted by the Attorney General under any statute to enforce the guarantees of the fifteenth amendment in any State or political subdivision the court finds that a test or device has been used for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, it shall suspend the use of tests and devices in such State or political subdivisions as the court shall determine is appropriate and for such period as it deems necessary.

(c) If in any proceeding instituted by the Attorney General under any statute to enforce the guarantees of the fifteenth amendment in any State or political subdivision the court finds that violations of the fifteenth amendment justifying equitable relief have occurred within the territory of such State or political subdivision. the court, in addition to such relief as it may grant, shall retain jurisdiction for such period as it may deem appropriate and during such period no voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect at the time the proceeding was commenced shall be enforced unless and until the court finds that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color: Provided, That such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure may be enforced if the qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure has been submitted by the chief legal officer or other appropriate official of such State or subdivision to the Attorney General and the Attorney General has not interposed an objection within sixty days after such submission, except that neither the court's finding nor the Attorney General's failure to object shall bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure.

79 STAT. 437.
79 STAT. 438.

Use of tests or devices prohibited. Declaratory judgment proceedings.

SEC. 4. (a) To assure that the right of citizens of the United States to vote is not denied or abridged on account of race or color, no citizen shall be denied the right to vote in any Federal, State, or local election because of his failure to comply with any test or device in any State with respect to which the determinations have been made under subsection (b) or in any political subdivision with respect to which such determinations have been made as a separate unit, unless the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in an action for a declaratory judgment brought by such State or subdivision against the United States has determined that no such test or device has been used during the five years preceding the filing of the action for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color: Provided, That no such declaratory judgment shall issue with respect to any plaintiff for a period of five years after the entry of a final judgment of any court of the United States, other than the denial of a declaratory judgment under this section, whether entered prior to or after the enactment of this Act, determining that denials or abridgments of the right to vote on account of race or color through the use of such tests or devices have occurred anywhere in the territory of such plaintiff.

An action pursuant to this subsection shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28 of the United States Code and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court. The court shall retain jurisdiction of any action pursuant to this subsection for five years after judgment and shall reopen the action upon motion of the Attorney General alleging that a test or device has been used for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color.

If the Attorney General determines that he has no reason to believe that any such test or device has been used during the five years preceding the filing of the action for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, he shall consent to the entry of such judgment.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall apply in any State or in any political subdivision of a state which (1) the Attorney General determines maintained on November 1, 1964, any test or device, and with respect to which (2) the Director of the Census determines that less than 50 per centum of the persons of voting age residing therein were registered on November 1, 1964, or that less than 50 per centum of such persons voted in the presidential election of November 1964.

Publication in Federal Register.

A determination or certification of the Attorney General or of the Director of the Census under this section or under section 6 or section 13 shall not be reviewable in any court and shall be effective upon publication in the Federal Register.

"Test or device."

(c) The phrase "test or device" shall mean any requirement that a person as a prerequisite for voting or registration for voting (1) demonstrate the ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter, (2) demonstrate any educational achievement or his knowledge of any particular subject, (3) possess good moral character, or (4) prove his qualifications by the voucher of registered voters or members of any other class.

79 STAT. 438.
79 STAT. 439.

(d) For purposes of this section no State or political subdivision shall be determined to have engaged in the use of tests or devices for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color if (1) incidents of such use have been few in number and have been promptly and effectively corrected by State or local action, (2) the continuing effect of such incidents has been eliminated, and (3) there is no reasonable probability of their recurrence in the future.

(e)(1) Congress hereby declares that to secure the rights under the fourteenth amendment of persons educated in American-flag schools in which the predominant classroom language was other than English, it is necessary to prohibit the States from conditioning the right to vote of such persons on ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language.

(2) No person who demonstrates that he has successfully completed the sixth primary grade in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, any State or territory, the District of Columbia, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the predominant classroom language was other than English, shall be denied the right to vote in any Federal, State, or local election because of his inability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language, except that in States in which State law provides that a different level of education is presumptive of literacy, he shall demonstrate that he has successfully completed an equivalent level of education in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, any State or territory, the District of Columbia, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the predominant classroom language was other than English.

SEC. 5. Whenever a State or political subdivision with respect to which the prohibitions set forth in section 4(a) are in effect shall enact or seek to administer any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on November 1, 1964, such State or subdivision may institute an action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, and unless and until the court enters such judgment no person shall be denied the right to vote for failure to comply with such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure: Provided, That such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure may be enforced without such proceeding if the qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure has been submitted by the chief legal officer or other appropriate official of such State or subdivision to the Attorney General and the Attorney General has not interposed an objection within sixty days after such submission, except that neither the Attorney General's failure to object nor a declaratory judgment entered under this section shall bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure. Any action under this section shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28 of the United States Code and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court.

62 Stat. 968.

SEC. 6. Whenever (a) a court has authorized the appointment of examiners pursuant to the provisions of section 3(a), or (b) unless a declaratory judgment has been rendered under section 4(a), the Appointment of examiners.

Attorney General certifies with respect to any political subdivision named in, or included within the scope of, determinations made under section 4(b) that (1) he has received complaints in writing from twenty or more residents of such political subdivision alleging that they have been denied the right to vote under color of law on account of race or color, and that he believes such complaints to be meritorious, or (2) that in his judgment (considering, among other factors, whether the ratio of nonwhite persons to white persons registered to vote within such subdivision appears to him to be reasonably attributable to violations of the fifteenth amendment or whether substantial evidence exists that bona fide efforts are being made within such subdivision to comply with the fifteenth amendment), the appointment of examiners is otherwise necessary to enforce the guarantees of the fifteenth amendment, the Civil Service Commission shall appoint as many examiners for such subdivision as it may deem appropriate to prepare and maintain lists of persons eligible to vote in Federal, State, and local elections. Such examiners, hearing officers provided for in section 9(a), and other persons deemed necessary by the Commission to carry out the provisions and purposes of this Act shall be appointed, compensated, and separated without regard to the provisions of any statute administered by the Civil Service Commission, and service under this Act shall not be considered employment for the purposes of any statute administered by the Civil Service Commission, except the provisions of section 9 of the Act of August 2, 1939, as amended (5 U.S.C. 118i), prohibiting partisan political activity: Provided, That the Commission is authorized, after consulting the head of the appropriate department or agency, to designate suitable persons in the official service of the United States, with their consent, to serve in these positions. Examiners and hearing officers shall have the power to administer oaths.

53 Stat. 1148; 64 Stat. 475.

Duties of examiners.

SEC. 7. (a) The examiners for each political subdivision shall, at such places as the Civil Service Commission shall by regulation designate, examine applicants concerning their qualifications for voting. An application to an examiner shall be in such form as the Commission may require and shall contain allegations that the applicant is not otherwise registered to vote.

List of eligible voters.

(b) Any person whom the examiner finds, in accordance with instructions received under section 9(b), to have the qualifications prescribed by State law not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States shall promptly be placed on a list of eligible voters. A challenge to such listing may be made in accordance with section 9(a) and shall not be the basis for a prosecution under section 12 of this Act. The examiner shall certify and transmit such list, and any supplements as appropriate, at least once a month, to the offices of the appropriate election officials, with copies to the Attorney General and the attorney general of the State, and any such lists and supplements thereto transmitted during the month shall be available for public inspection on the last business day of the month and in any event not later than the forty-fifth day prior to any election. The appropriate State or local election official shall place such names on the official voting list. Any person whose name appears on the examiner's list shall be entitled and allowed to vote in the election district of his residence unless and until the appropriate election officials shall have been notified that such person has been removed from such list in accordance with subsection (d): Provided, That no person shall be entitled to vote in any election by virtue of this Act unless his name shall have been certified and transmitted on such a list to the offices of the appropriate election officials at least forty-five days prior to such election.

(c) The examiner shall issue to each person whose name appears on such a list a certificate evidencing his eligibility to vote.

(d) A person whose name appears on such a list shall be removed therefrom by an examiner if (1) such person has been successfully challenged in accordance with the procedure prescribed in section 9, or (2) he has been determined by an examiner to have lost his eligibility to vote under State law not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

Observers at elections.

SEC. 8. Whenever an examiner is serving under this Act in any political subdivision, the Civil Service Commission may assign, at the request of the Attorney General, one or more persons, who may be officers of the United States, (1) to enter and attend at any place for holding an election in such subdivision for the purpose of observing whether persons who are entitled to vote are being permitted to vote, and (2) to enter and attend at any place for tabulating the votes cast at any election held in such subdivision for the purpose of observing whether votes cast by persons entitled to vote are being properly tabulated. Such persons so assigned shall report to an examiner appointed for such political subdivision, to the Attorney General, and if the appointment of examiners has been authorized pursuant to section 3(a), to the court.

Challenges to eligibility listings, hearings.

SEC. 9. (a) Any challenge to a listing on an eligibility list prepared by an examiner shall be heard and determined by a hearing officer appointed by and responsible to the Civil Service Commission and under such rules as the Commission shall by regulation prescribe. Such challenge shall be entertained only if filed at such office within the State as the Civil Service Commission shall by regulation designate, and within ten days after the listing of the challenged person is made available for public inspection, and if suported by (1) the affidavits of at least two persons having personal knowledge of the facts constituting grounds for the challenge, and (2) a certification that a copy of the challenge and affidavits have been served by mail or in person upon the person challenged at his place of residence set out in the application. Such challenge shall be determined within fifteen days after it has been filed. A petition for review of the decision of the hearing officer may be filed in the United States court of appeals for the circuit in which the person challenged resides within fifteen days after service of such decision by mail on the person petitioning for review but no decision of a hearing officer shall be reversed unless clearly erroneous. Any person listed shall be entitled and allowed to vote pending final determination by the hearing officer and by the court.

Procedural regulations.

(b) The times, places, procedures, and form for application and listing pursuant to this Act and removals from the eligibility lists shall be prescribed by regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission and the Commission shall, after consultation with the Attorney General, instruct examiners concerning applicable State law not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States with respect to (1) the qualifications required for listing, and (2) loss of eligibility to vote.

Subpena power.

(c) Upon the request of the applicant or the challenger or on its own motion the Civil Service Commission shall have the power to require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence relating to any matter pending before it under the authority of this section. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena, any district court of the United States or the United States court of any territory or possession, or the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides or is domiciled or transacts business, or has appointed an agent for receipt of service of process, upon application by the Attorney General of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or a hearing officer, there to produce pertinent, relevant, and nonprivileged documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give testimony touching the matter under investigation; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

Poll tax.

SEC. 10. (a) The Congress finds that the requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a precondition to voting (i) precludes persons of limited means from voting or imposes unreasonable financial hardship upon such persons as a precondition to their exercise of the franchise, (ii) does not bear a reasonable relationship to any legitimate State interest in the conduct of elections, and (iii) in some areas has the purpose or effect of denying persons the right to vote because of race or color. Upon the basis of these findings, Congress declares that the constitutional right of citizens to vote is denied or abridged in some areas by the requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a precondition to voting.

(b) In the exercise of the powers of Congress under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment and section 2 of the fifteenth amendment, the Attorney General is authorized and directed to institute forthwith in the name of the United States such actions, including actions against States or political subdivisions, for declaratory judgment or injunctive relief against the enforcement of any requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a precondition to voting, or substitute therefor enacted after November 1, 1964, as will be necessary to implement the declaration of subsection (a) and the purposes of this section.

(c) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of such actions which shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28 of the United States Code and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court. It shall be the duty of the judges designated to hear the case to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, to participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and to cause the case to be in every way expedited.

62 Stat. 968.

(d) During the pendency of such actions, and thereafter if the courts, notwithstanding this action by the Congress, should declare the requirement of the payment of a poll tax to be constitutional, no citizen of the United States who is a resident of a State or political subdivision with respect to which determinations have been made under subsection 4(b) and a declaratory judgment has not been entered under subsection 4(a), during the first year he becomes otherwise entitled to vote by reason of registration by State or local officials or listing by an examiner, shall be denied the right to vote for failure to pay a poll tax if he tenders payment of such tax for the current year to an examiner or to the appropriate State or local official at least forty-five days prior to election, whether or not such tender would be timely or adequate under State law. An examiner shall have authority to accept such payment from any person authorized by this Act to make an application for listing, and shall issue a receipt for such payment. The examiner shall transmit promptly any such poll tax payment to the office of the State or local official authorized to receive such payment under State law, together with the name and address of the applicant.

Prohibitions.

SEC. 11. (a) No person acting under color of law shall fail or refuse to permit any person to vote who is entitled to vote under any provision of this Act or is otherwise qualified to vote, or willfully fail or refuse to tabulate, count, and report such person's vote.

(b) No person, whether acting under color of law or otherwise, shall intimidate, threaten, or coerce, or attempt to intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person for voting or attempting to vote, or intimidate, threaten, or coerce, or attempt to intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person for urging or aiding any person to vote or attempt to vote, or intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person for exercising any powers or duties under section 3(a), 6, 8, 9, 10, or 12(e).

Penalty.

(c) Whoever knowingly or willfully gives false information as to his name, address, or period of residence in the voting district for the purpose of establishing his eligibility to register or vote, or conspires with another individual for the purpose of encouraging his false registration to vote or illegal voting, or pays or offers to pay or accepts payment either for registration to vote or for voting shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both:

Applicability.

Provided, however, That this provision shall be applicable only to general, special, or primary elections held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the United States Senate, Member of the United States House of Representatives, or Delegates or Commissioners from the territories or possessions, or Resident Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

(d) Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of an examiner or hearing officer knowingly and willfully falsifies or conceals a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 12. (a) Whoever shall deprive or attempt to deprive any person of any right secured by section 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, or 10 or shall violate section 11 (a) or (b), shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(b) Whoever, within a year following an election in a political subdivision in which an examiner has been appointed (1) destroys, defaces, mutilates, or otherwise alters the marking of a paper ballot which has been cast in such election, or (2) alters any official record of voting in such election tabulated from a voting machine or otherwise, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(c) Whoever conspires to violate the provisions of subsection (a) or (b) of this section, or interferes with any right secured by section 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, or 11 (a) or (b) shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Injunctions, etc.

(d) Whenever any person has engaged or there are reasonable grounds to believe that any person is about to engage in any act or practice prohibited by section 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, 11, or subsection (b) of this section, the Attorney General may institute for the United States, or in the name of the United States, an action for preventive relief, including an application for a temporary or permanent injunction, restraining order, or other order, and including an order directed to the State and State or local election officials to require them (1) to permit persons listed under this Act to vote and (2) to count such votes.

(e) Whenever in any political subdivision in which there are examiners appointed pursuant to this Act any persons allege to such an examiner within forty-eight hours after the closing of the polls that notwithstanding (1) their listing under this Act or registration by an appropriate election official and (2) their eligibility to vote, they have not been permitted to vote in such election, the examiner shall forthwith notify the Attorney General if such allegations in his opinion appear to be well founded. Upon receipt of such notification, the Attorney General may forthwith file with the district court an application for an order providing for the marking, casting, and counting of the ballots of such persons and requiring the inclusion of their votes in the total vote before the results of such election shall be deemed final and any force or effect given thereto. The district court shall hear and determine such matters immediately after the filing of such application. The remedy provided in this subsection shall not preclude any remedy available under State or Federal law.

(f) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this section and shall exercise the same without regard to whether a person asserting rights under the provisions of this Act shall have exhausted any administrative or other remedies that may be provided by law.

Listing procedures, termination.

SEC. 13. Listing procedures shall be terminated in any political subdivision of any State (a) with respect to examiners appointed pursuant to clause (b) of section 6 whenever the Attorney General notifies the Civil Service Commission, or whenever the District Court for the District of Columbia determines in an action for declaratory judgment brought by any political subdivision with respect to which the Director of the Census has determined that more than 50 per centum of the nonwhite persons of voting age residing therein are registered to vote, (1) that all persons listed by an examiner for such subdivision have been placed on the appropriate voting registration roll, and (2) that there is no longer reasonable cause to believe that persons will be deprived of or denied the right to vote on account of race or color in such subdivision, and (b), with respect to examiners appointed pursuant to section 3(a), upon order of the authorizing court. A political subdivision may petition the Attorney General for the termination of listing procedures under clause (a) of this section, and may petition the Attorney General to request the Director of the Census to take such survey or census as may be appropriate for the making of the determination provided for in this section. The District Court for the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction to require such survey or census to be made by the Director of the Census and it shall require him to do so if it deems the Attorney General's refusal to request such survey or census to be arbitrary or unreasonable.

Criminal contempt proceedings.

SEC. 14. (a) All cases of criminal contempt arising under the provisions of this Act shall be governed by section 151 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1995).

71 Stat. 638.

(b) No court other than the District Court for the District of Columbia or a court of appeals in any proceeding under section 9 shall have jurisdiction to issue any declaratory judgment pursuant to section 4 or section 5 or any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction against the execution or enforcement of any provision of this Act or any action of any Federal officer or employee pursuant hereto.

"Vote" or "voting."

(c) (1) The terms "vote" or "voting" shall include all action necessary to make a vote effective in any primary, special, or general election, including, but not limited to, registration, listing pursuant to this Act, or other action required by law prerequisite to voting, casting a ballot, and having such ballot counted properly and included in the appropriate totals of votes cast with respect to candidates for public or party office and propositions for which votes are received in an election.

"Political subdivision."

(2) The term "political subdivision" shall mean any county or parish, except that where registration for voting is not conducted under the supervision of a county or parish, the term shall include any other subdivision of a State which conducts registration for voting.

Armed Forces, voting rights study.

SEC. 16. The Attorney General and the Secretary of Defense, jointly, shall make a full and complete study to determine whether, under the laws or practices of any State or States, there are preconditions to voting, which might tend to result in discrimination against citizens serving in the Armed Forces of the United States seeking to vote. Such officials shall, jointly, make a report to the Congress not later than June 30, 1966, containing the results of such study, together with a list of any States in which such preconditions exist, and shall include in such report such recommendations for legislation as they deem advisable to prevent discrimination in voting against citizens serving in the Armed Forces of the United States.

Report to Congress.

SEC. 17. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to deny, impair, or otherwise adversely affect the right to vote of any person registered to vote under the law of any State or political subdivision.

Appropriation.

SEC. 18. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 19. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of the provision to other persons not similarly situated or to other circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Approved August 6, 1965.

INTRODUCTION

Among the first considerations of the 1966 Kentucky General Assembly was a civil rights Act, with coverage in the areas of public accommodations and employment. This Act had the support of the Governor of Kentucky, the bi-partisan support of legislators around the State, the editorial support of leading Kentucky newspapers, and the support of individuals and groups recognizing the moral necessity for state civil rights legislation. This digest is written to help individual citizens become acquainted with the major facets of the civil rights Act.

The Federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 emphasizes that its enforcement should be through state agencies which function under state laws compatible with the federal statute. When the state assumes its responsibility for the protection of the rights of its citizens, federal enforcement of the Civil Rights Act becomes unnecessary.

The Kentucky Civil Rights Act will meet the requirements of the Federal Law and will provide more sensitive, more efficient, and less remote enforcement procedures than the federal law. This act uses as a model the Uniform State Civil Rights Act which is being drafted by a special committee of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. This group is composed of outstanding judges, lawyers, and law professors from all sections of the United States including the South.

While the heart of the bill is contained in the three articles covering public accommodations, fair employment practices, and enforcement; there are seven articles in the bill as follows:

1. Declaration of Purpose; Construction; Severability
2. General Definitions
3. Discrimination in Employment
4. Discrimination in Public Accommodations
5. Enforcement; Judicial Review
6. Miscellaneous
7. Local Human Rights Commissions

Purpose of the Act

The purpose of this Act is to safeguard all individuals within the state from discrimination because of race, color, religion, and national origin in connection with employment and public accommodations. Discrimination is a matter of state concern because it involves an individual's personal dignity and freedom from humiliation. Such discrimination deprives the state of the full productive capacities of individuals, foments strife and unrest, menaces the democratic institutions of the state, and damages the interests, rights, and privileges of all persons within the state.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

Equal access to employment opportunities is the greatest need of minority persons today. Persons who are unemployed or under-utilized because of their race, color, religion, or national origin do not have the opportunity to contribute their full productive capacities toward a better life for themselves, their families, and for the whole society. Discrimination in employment practices is a continuing problem in Kentucky and is a problem which a Kentucky fair employment practices law can help remedy. Certainly, the continuation of Kentucky's business and industrial growth without racial friction is one reason for passage of the Act.

Coverage

Employment discrimination is covered by article three of the Act. Basically Sections 302 through 306 state that race, color, religion, and national origin are not lawful criteria for making employment decisions. Like the Federal Law, employers, employment agencies, and labor organizations will be covered by the Act. Employers hiring 8 or more employees within the State in each of twenty or more weeks in the calendar year will be covered. Thus, 80% of Kentucky's employees and 22% of employers will be covered.

The smaller employees of the state will not be covered by the Act. Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 will cover employers hiring 25 or more employees, to be fully effective in 1968. This would exclude most of Kentucky's employers (93%) and a very large percentage of Kentucky employees (40%). Kentucky should act to protect as many employees from discrimination as possible.

Equal Treatment Based on Individual Merit

It is made clear in the Act that an employer can use seniority and merit systems and can make employment decisions on the basis of professionally developed ability tests. One section makes its doubly clear that nothing in the Act requires preferential treatment for any person or group; all that is required is equality of treatment based on individual merit.

Reasonable Provisions for Exemptions

Religious institutions, including church related or supported educational institutions, will be able to exercise a religious preference in choosing their employees where religion is a reasonable occupational qualification. However, race, color, and national origin will not be considered valid qualifications in these cases.

Similar provisions allow the exercise of preferences based on religion or national origin for an employer, employment agency, or labor organization where such qualifications are reasonably necessary to the normal operation of the enterprise.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS PROVISIONS

The Kentucky Act will apply generally to places of public accommodation which serve the public. Its clear coverage will be fair to proprietors because it will apply equally to all businesses. This Uniform rule will help to eliminate anxiety and avoid incidents.

With certain exceptions it will cover places of public accommodation, including ". . . any place, store or other establishment, either licensed or unlicensed which supplies goods or services to the general public or which is supported directly or indirectly by government funds."

In Title II of the Federal Act of 1964, services, places of active amusement and recreational facilities such as bowling alleys, skating rinks, and driving ranges are not all covered. Under the state Act, these loopholes will be eliminated.

Experience with state public accommodations laws has shown that it is best to word coverage provisions in general terms. Earlier laws contained detailed lists of the kinds of covered establishments. No list can possibly name all of the changing forms of enterprise created by American business ingenuity. As a result, the detailed coverage sections have required frequent amendments.

Chapter Four of the Kentucky Act covers discrimination in places of public accommodation. The places which are required not to discriminate are defined in Section 402 (a). Exceptions are made in Section 402 (a) for barber shops, beauty shops, owner occupied tourist homes of 5 rooms or less, and bona fide private clubs (where policies are actually determined by members and admission is limited to members and their guests). These exemptions are provided in the light of practical, political conditions in Kentucky today and are similar to those in the Federal Act.

IMPLEMENTATION AND EMFORCEMENT

Persuasion the Key to Compliance

The legislation will emphasize efforts at persuasion and conciliation by the Commission on Human Rights. Only where these methods failed will the Commission be required to hold hearings. The whole enforcement procedure in Article 5 is based on the best available methods followed by other state agencies. Many of the procedures are taken from the Model State Administrative Procedure Act.

The duties and obligations of the Commission are spelled out in detail in Section 502. The procedure for complaint, investigation, and conciliation is covered in Section 503. Section 502 (a) states who may file a complaint and sets a limit of six months within which a complaint must be filed. Employment complaints have an even shorter time limit of 90 days.

Upon receiving a complaint, the Commission will conduct a preliminary investigation to determine if there is probable cause to believe that an unlawful discrimination has occurred. If probable cause is found, the Commission must proceed to encourage complaince by conference, conciliation, and persuasion.

Experience has shown that conciliation activities effectively settle nearly all cases. If these efforts fail, the Commission would serve a complaint upon the respondent (Section 504), hold a hearing, and subpoena witnesses and documents. All hearings are to be conducted in accordance with strict procedures specified by the Act.

Advantages of Commission Procedures

Based on experience in other states most of the Commission's work will continue to be devoted to educational efforts to encourage voluntary compliance. The Commission would facilitate smooth change by sharing with employers and proprietors the wide-spread experience of other Kentucky businessmen who have successfully desegregated. When complaints are filed, the preliminary investigations under the Act can help screen out baseless charges and protect businessmen from harassment, and from unjustified legal defenses. When the complaint is justified, a mandatory conference, conciliation and persuasion procedure must be followed. The conciliation efforts are strictly confidential, and the vast majority of complaints are settled at this stage without publicity.

Kentuckians who are familiar with problems throughout the State make up the Commission. They have been working for five years to encourage voluntary equal treatment and have built up a large body of experience in these matters. Four Commission members, including the Chairman, are to be appointed by the Governor in 1966, and the bill provides new language to insure bi-partisan representation of employers, proprietors, trade unions, religious groups, human rights groups, and the general public.

Protection of Employer's and Complainant's Rights

A member of the Commission who filed a complaint or who endeavored to eliminate the alleged discrimination will be barred from participating in a hearing or subsequent deliberation in that case (Section 504 b). This separation between the investigative and hearing functions of the Commission will assure the fairness of the procedure. After hearing, the Commission could issue a cease and desist order upon a finding that the law had been violated. The final orders of the Commission could be reviewed and enforced in the local circuit courts.

If, on the other hand, the Commission staff determines after investigation that there was no probable cause, then the complaint will be dismissed (Section 503 b and c). The complainant has a right to appeal this decision to the full Commission and to appeal a decision of the Commission to the courts. Safeguards to protect the rights of employers and complainants from arbitrary action by the Commission at any stage of the process are included in Section 507. The availability of judicial review is an integral part of the process and is available to any party who feels that he has been aggrieved by a decision of the Commission.

Avoidance of Record Keeping Burdens

To avoid undue burdens on persons subject to the Act, Section 508 (e) provides that necessary information keeping will conform to similar records and reports already required by federal law and government contract regulations. For the purpose of uniformity and in the interest of multi-state employers, the state could adopt the regulations of the Federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission on this matter. A public hearing must precede adoption of such regulations. Under Section 508 (d) an employer who believed the provisions would result in "undue hardship" could ask the Commission for relief or bring an action in circuit court.

Procedures for Subpoenas

The Act provides subpoena procedures for the Commission in Section 502 (i) and upon application to parties to a Commission hearing in Section 509. Subpoenas are necessary to enable all parties to present their evidence. All the normal judicial safeguards surround this process. Careful limits on relevancy are written into the Act. Before a court would enforce a subpoena the Commission would have to prove that the witnesses or documents sought pertain to possible unlawful discriminatory practices. Thus, general fishing expeditions can not be made. In Kentucky, other state commissions which exercise similar functions, (such as the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board, the Board of Agriculture, and the Department of Health), can issue subpoenas and they have proven necessary.

Article 6 makes retaliation and conspiracy to retaliate against anyone exercising rights guaranteed by this Act an unlawful practice punishable by a fine and/or imprisonment. The Act as a whole provides for civil remedies and this sanction is only for situations where a person is not otherwise covered.

LOCAL HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSIONS

All levels of government have an obligation to protect their citizens from the evils of discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and this Act provide for local implementation of non-discrimination policies where local agencies have sufficient enforcement power and staff for good faith implementation.

Enabling legislation for the highly desirable local efforts to eliminate discrimination is provided in Article 7. It will supplement the Act passed by the General Assembly in 1962 to encourage establishment of local human rights commissions and permit local governing bodies to give them additional duties. Counties will be authorized to create commissions and cities and counties could then legally cooperate to eliminate discriminatory practices. Cities and counties could pass ordinances which will be enforceable in circuit courts of the state. Before the Act, a city could only use criminal sanctions in police courts.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Act contains several features which experience in other states has shown to be significant. The employment section applies to "the State, any of its political or civil subdivisions or agencies;" (Section 201). Discriminatory advertising is prohibited in employment, (Section 306) and in public accommodations (Section 403). Commission members can initiate complaints under the provisions of Section 502 (h) and 503 (a). The Commission can provide by regulation for the posting of notices regarding coverage of the Act, Section 502 (n). Efforts to weaken the Act by requiring a trial de novo, and a showing of "intentional" discrimination were not successful.

The 1960 General Assembly created the Commission and directed it, among its other powers and duties, to recommend ways of eliminating injustices occasioned by discrimination. On the basis of its five years of efforts to eliminate discrimination by voluntary methods, the Commission recommended the enactment of a public accommodations and employment law. This digest seeks to explain that law.

Introduction

Few problems in American society have persisted so stubbornly as those of the people who live on and from the land: working farmers, farm workers, and migrants. Poverty and endemic unemployment, with their attendant conditions of poor health and housing, child labor and meager education, have been discovered and publicized, but more lamented than changed. An estimated one hundred and fifty attempts in this century to improve these conditions by legislation and administrative action have resulted in scant progress.

This curious pattern was analyzed by the late Lloyd Fisher, one of the country's outstanding students of agricultural economics:

> Reform is more frequently a problem of power than of knowledge. The unpleasant and even shocking facts of disease and malnutrition, the brutalizing effects of poverty, are well enough known to lie heavily on the conscience of large sections of the American public. One of the curious characteristics of this problem is that the facts are rediscovered every few years. It is testimony to the drama and eloquence of the facts that we have not yet become altogether accustomed to them and they still have power to awaken conscience and even guilt.
> But conscience can only put the issues; it is political power that resolves them. Therefore a hiatus has existed, a persistent hiatus between intent and accomplishment.[1]

Farm workers have neither economic nor political power. They are unorganized and must rely on friends to speak for them. Most often they are disfranchised: by race, by lack of permanent residence, by poverty and ignorance.

But, in contrast, the financial giants who hire by far the greatest number of farm workers are, according to former Secretary of Labor Mitchell, the "toughest lobby" he ever faced. They have been able to keep their workers outside the protection and benefits of social legislation that other American workers have enjoyed for decades.

Such special interests have been forced to yield to a greater public good many times in our history. An informed public could insist that farm workers receive the same rights and benefits as other American workers. But the existence of these special interests in agriculture has not been sufficiently recognized or understood. The popular picture is still that of a hard-working, hard-pressed family farmer; and the corporations that control the farms where most farm workers are employed have hidden successfully behind this image. They have fostered the belief that nothing can be done to help farm workers without hurting the family farmer. So they have escaped footing a bill which they owe and can well afford to pay.

This pamphlet is an examination of American agriculture in an attempt to show who exploits farm workers, how this is done, and what remedies lie within the power of a concerned public.

Facts of Life for Farm Workers

"Forgotten Americans"

All the problems of farm workers are related to the fact that they have the lowest wage rates and total earnings and the highest unemployment rates of any group in the United States working force.

The average total income for all farm workers (excluding casual workers employed for less than 25 days) has varied little in the past three years. Their income from both farm and nonfarm work was $1,125 in 1960; in 1961 it had dropped to $1,054; and in 1962 it rose again to $1,164. The average earnings of migrants in 1962 were $874 from farm work, and $1,123 if nonfarm work is included.[2]

Unemployment and underemployment are increasing, due to agriculture's irregular and seasonal labor requirements, the spread of mechanization, and greater use of chemicals to control weed growth. The average number of days worked in agriculture by all farm workers in 1962 was 137, and by migrants, 116.[3] Much of this enforced idleness—waiting for a crop to ripen or for the rain to stop—takes place away from home where leisure cannot be put to productive or personal use.

Farm labor families are plagued by poor health, and by diseases related to poor diet and unsanitary living and working conditions.[4] Their work is frequently hazardous, and agriculture usually ranks as the third or fourth most dangerous occupation in terms of job-connected accidents.

Because of low family incomes, hundreds of thousands of children, many of them not yet teenagers, work in the fields, often on days when they should be in school.

. . . I saw families working — father, mother, older children, and youngsters who could not have been more than eight or nine. Hanging down from their belts and between their legs were open sacks into which they thrust ". . . lacks one or more of the conveniences . . ."

potatoes with unbelievable speed. The hands of the adults moved like machines, each hand seemingly guided by a separate force. Some moved so rapidly it was hard to follow them. The young children worked at a slower pace, and as the sacks grew heavy they found them more and more difficult to drag. . . . As I watched them work, my companion told me that several weeks earlier a baby had died in a prune orchard. Its parents had been picking and the baby, a six-weeks old infant, was lying on a blanket nearby. The coroner said death was from malnutrition and too much exposure to heat.[5]

The amount of time spent in travel and away from home cuts into school work, too. It is no wonder that the children of migrant workers are often years behind their normal grade. Thus they lose out on the education and training that could prepare them for other occupations and for a better livelihood than that of their parents. Farm workers are the only group whose educational achievements have not advanced in the past twenty years. The median of years of school completed by male farm laborers 18 years of age and over was 7.6 years in 1940 and only 7.7 years in 1959.[6]

Farm housing varies. But much of it lacks one or more of the conveniences long taken for granted in most American homes: electricity, heat, ventilation, hot and cold running water, sanitary facilities.

. . . In Hastings, Fla., the heart of the state's potato belt, I bunked for two days in a near-collapsed, insect-infested shanty for which I was compelled to pay $1.50 a night. Next door in an even more dilapidated hovel lived a married couple whose 2-month-old baby had been born there. They paid $10 a week.

The infant wailed endlessly from dawn to darkness in its makeshift crib, a cardboard cabbage carton, as flies and potato bugs crawled in and out of its mouth and nostrils. A ragged burlap potato sack served as the baby's blanket.

But Florida has no corner on squalor. Near Hightstown, N.J., less than 20 miles from Trenton, the state capital, I found seven men and women tomato pickers — none of them related — living in filth in a 10-foot square tarpaper shack for which they were charged $10 a week for rent.[7]

Some of the states that pride themselves on their fine new housing for farm workers — notably California — have built it all, barracks-like, for single men, with no provision for families.

Perhaps the most surprising aspect of farm workers' deprivation is the deliberate way in which they have been excluded from the legal protections that Americans have agreed other workers need: a minimum wage; a ban on child labor; a guarantee of the right to organize in unions and bargain collectively; disability insurance (in all but one state); and compulsory workmen's compensation (in all but a few).

Why Do They Stay?

Given such conditions, why does anyone apply for farm work? The answer is often lack of any alternative means of earning a living. Some farm workers are born to it, disadvantaged as children, and lacking the elementary training to move into other work. Some are forced into it: the dustbowl tragedy moved many Anglos off dead land and after crops wherever they might be; and as the agricultural revolution liquidates sharecropping and as marginal small farmers go under, they try to stick to the work they know.

Some have additional disadvantages which aggravate their poverty and ignorance. It is no coincidence that most migrants and seasonal workers in agriculture today are either Negroes or Mexican-Americans. Other minorities, including American Indians, are also well represented. Seasonal workers in agriculture tend to be the poorest and most defenseless of the work force: people with limited access to other occupations, with little education or opportunity for education; people handicapped by race, language, and cultural differences.

To be sure, some people working in agriculture prefer farm work to other jobs. They like working out-of-doors, prefer country to city, find dealing with growing plants creative, and love the soil. For most of these, their dream is a farm of their own — their more practical hope, a year-round farm job.

But few like the conditions of life and work, and most find less and less work available to them in agriculture. Migrants from the south often remain in northern areas after the season. But north or south, unskilled and semiskilled jobs which they might fill are disappearing from the urban economy, as farms are disappearing from the rural scene. The prospect of getting out of farm work must seem as dismal to them as the prospect of staying in.

In seeking governmental approval for importation of foreign workers, farm employers have protested that domestic workers will not do "stoop labor" or that there are not enough domestics. The actual situation is just the reverse: there is not enough work to go around. Moreover, the American economy embraces many trades that are just as hot, just as dirty, just as backbreaking as farm labor, and all are plied by American workers. But no work is so ill-rewarded.

Agribusiness vs. the Family Farm

Two patterns of agriculture have existed in this country almost from the beginning: the family farm, which became the national ideal, and the plantation, its very antithesis.

As late as 1910, one out of every three Americans lived on a farm which he or his family owned. Until about fifty years ago this family farm produced mainly for home consumption, marketing any surplus to buy necessities which the farm itself could not supply.

When more labor than their own was needed, farmers called upon neighboring families whom they would help out in turn. When help was needed over a longer period of time, a hired man was employed, usually on a year-round basis. He might well be the son of a neighbor, earning money to set up for himself. If single, he was apt to live in the farmer's home and take his meals at the family table. If married, he and his wife might be provided with a house and a plot of ground to grow their own vegetables. Farmer and hired man had similar social background and outlook, and worked as equals.

The plantation economy presented a very different picture. Huge enterprises, growing cash crops for sale in distant markets, were worked not by the owner and his family but by large numbers of landless workers with no rights and no prospects of becoming farm owners. Emancipation did not change the basic economy. Former slaves became sharecroppers, and gradually some became tenant farmers. Many of their descendants who remained in rural areas have become day-haul farm workers or migrants. Relatively few have succeeded as independent farm owners.

As farming was changed by mechanization into a business requiring greater capital investment than most individual farmers could afford, labor relationships changed further and absentee ownership grew. An apt description of the change was given by

Wells A. Sherman, former chief marketing specialist of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics:

> . . . Mass production has thus brought about what may be called the mechanization of the human element in the industry. The harvesting gangs are called in when wanted just as the tractor and the gang plow are brought out of the shed when needed.[8]

This new kind of farming, aptly called "agribusiness," is really an extension and elaboration of the old plantation system. Spreading into other sections of the country, and often into areas which had previously been characterized by family farming, it combined the new feature of heavy capital investment in machinery with the old reliance on a large supply of cheap labor. Sometimes this new pattern in agriculture is openly discussed by agribusinessmen. A 1961 series, "Trends in California Agriculture," printed in the Los Angeles Times, noted:

> . . . Farming in California today is a far cry from the pastoral scene of haystacks and horse-drawn plows. The farmer who isn't prepared to invest thousands of dollars in heavy equipment, or to contract for services he can't perform himself, simply isn't going to do much more than perhaps feed his own family.
>
> In the words of one observer, farming here "is usually an intensive, specialized, commercial undertaking conducted for the purpose of obtaining income from the employment of labor, managerial ability and capital."
>
> "Agribusiness" is the term used to describe the new look in California farming today, and its meaning is fairly self evident. If he is not a multimillionaire entrepreneur with offices in Los Angeles or San Francisco, the farmer must at least be a competent businessman capable of making large capital outlays and directing his operations in the fashion of a corporate executive. . . .[9]

On other occasions, this trend is carefully ignored or obscured. The identification of the agribusinessman with the working farmer is most often substituted for fact when agribusiness faces an attempt to extend fair labor practices to agricultural employment. The outgoing president of the Western Growers Association, E. B. (Swede) Antonell, has said:

> Legislators of the past, in their wisdom recognized the need of an unfettered and unregulated agricultural industry — unregulated in so far as wages, hours and unionism were concerned but regulated to the point where both farmer and public would benefit.
>
> Because the farmer is at the mercy of the elements, where he could be burned out one day, frozen out the next, flooded the following day and could conceivably lose his entire crop, the legislators have exempted him > from many of the regulations which govern staple manufacturing.

>
> The farmer's day begin [sic] before sunup and ends when his work is done, be it 7 p.m. or 12 p.m., and most farmers admit generally to working two normal shifts every 24 hours. . . .[10]

Such a farmer is apt to regard himself, in the words of Lloyd Fisher, as > . . . a natural agent of the forces of freedom, which he is more likely to define as freedom to raise, harvest, and market his crop than as freedom of speech and assembly for those whose stake in society is less than his own.[11]

The Los Angeles Times of February 16, 1961, has provided an appropriate footnote on freedom:

> Cocking anxious eyes at the explosive farm labor dispute in Imperial Valley, city councilmen in this farming community [Fountain Valley] have passed laws which they admit are designed to avert union demonstrations, including picketing. . . .
>
> Mayor Kanno said the laws, while new to the comparatively new city of Fountain Valley, are similar to others in effect in most of the older Orange County communities.

The Agricultural Revolution

The transformation of agriculture has been largely unnoticed by the average citizen who lives in an urban environment and has little direct contact with rural America. But in the country it is impossible not to see the change to fewer and larger farms and the increasing crop specialization. Along with this has come the displacement of some two million farm operators and their families within a decade, and the seasonal arrival and departure of large numbers of nonlocal laborers. Farms are mortgaged, stores sold, churches and schools closed, as families move off the land.

Technological developments have accelerated the pace. Rapid transportation, refrigeration, and new techniques of food preservation enable today's farmer to specialize in crops best fitted for the soil and climatic conditions of his particular farm. The pattern of fairly even labor requirements stretching over most of the year has changed into one of concentrated need at planting and harvest times.

Labor-saving machinery, improved fertilizers, crop-dusters, and other technical advances have resulted in a dramatic increase of farm goods produced with less physical effort than ever before. In 1910, a farm worker produced enough food and fiber for seven persons. By 1960, despite a substantial increase in per capita consumption, each farm worker produced enough goods to meet the needs of 24 people. Between 1950 and 1960 alone, farm output rose nearly 85 per cent.[12]

In the same decade, the number of farms in the United States dropped from 5.4 million to 3.7 million.[13] In other words, nearly a third of the people engaged in farming twelve years ago no longer make their living as farm operators, and most of those still trying are in serious financial trouble.

In October, 1962, the Department of Agriculture estimated that gross sales of $13,400 annually were required to return an income of only $2,500 to the farm family, and $26,800 to return $5,000,[14] which more nearly approaches an adequate income. This is a considerable rise since the 1959 census of agriculture, when $10,000 would return $2,500; yet only 21.5 per cent of the farms sold that much.

Clearly, many more farmers, and still more of their children, will have to leave the land – whether they want to or not – in order to earn a decent living. Their problem is often compounded by lack of resources, education, and alternative skills, so that they must choose between low-paid and sporadic employment in agriculture and the diminishing number of unskilled nonfarm jobs.

Modern agriculture's remarkable achievements in production have thus brought with them increasing difficulties for people.

Who Hires Farm Labor?

The public image of family-farm agriculture is so strong that it is family farmers who are widely assumed to benefit by freedom from social legislation. Hiding behind this powerful image are the giant agribusiness corporations.

Less than 9 per cent of all the nation's farmers own nearly 40 per cent of all farm land. They account for more than 30 per cent of all cropland harvested and nearly 50 per cent of farm sales. And they pay more than two-thirds of the total farm wage bill.[15]

U.S. Department of Labor: Hired Farm Workers in the United States, June, 1961; p. 6.

These are the farms that employ the vast majority of hired farm workers. These are the farm employers that are still pressing for the importation of foreign workers. These are the employers who would have to pay a minimum wage if farm workers were treated like other workers under the law.

A few of these farms are so fabulous as to defy imagination. One such enterprise – it can hardly be called a farm – is the Kern

County Land Company. It owns 2,800 square miles of land, an area twice the size of the state of Rhode Island. KCLC owns land in 14 states. Its cattle division alone occupies nearly a million and a half acres in Arizona and New Mexico. At the very least, the company owns nearly 350,000 acres in the Central Valley of California.[16]

KCLC itself farms 11,000 acres and it leases another 116,000. The company has some 250 tenants who are technically sharecroppers, since they pay rent in kind – for instance, in cotton. But, according to Fortune, "the tenants look less like sharecroppers than like 'agribusinessmen.' " Many of them work through partnerships or corporations, and about four-fifths of them farm other land in addition to their KCLC leaseholds. Several own as many as 10,000 acres; these holdings, together with their leased lands, make them bigger farm producers than KCLC itself. A number of tenants are KCLC stockholders. Several (including the family of W. B. Camp, treasurer of the United States Chamber of Commerce) have private planes. Tenant operations are heavily mechanized, and the capital investment of some tenants runs to $250,000.[17]

Kern County Land Company is not unique, although it is probably the largest of its kind. In Southern California, large landownerships predominate, and the owners are often far removed from agriculture. Standard Oil owns 218,485.48 acres, 5.5 per cent of the total, and other oil companies account for 264,678.64 acres, or 6.6 per cent. Southern Pacific Railroad owns 201,851.75 acres, or 5.1 per cent; the Tejon Ranch, 168,531.07 acres, or 4.2 per cent. These are the largest, but roughly two-thirds of Southern California land is in the hands of owners of more than 1,000 acres apiece.[18]

Agriculture in Arizona is even more the product of corporate investment than it is in California. Specialty-crop farming did not begin there until water was made available, usually by reclamation projects financed largely or entirely by federal funds. The completion of Roosevelt Dam in 1911, followed by the expanded markets opened to United States farmers in World War I, marked the beginning.

The average Arizona grower-shipper, according to the 1962 Yearbook of the Western Grower and Shipper, invests about $600,000 annually in growing, harvesting, and packing his crop. The 1959 Census of Agriculture reported that the total vegetable crop sales for the state that year amounted to $37.5 million, of which all but $1.5 million went to 180 farms, or only 2.5 per cent of the state's farms.

Since the inception of the industry in Arizona, control has been concentrated in, and profits have redounded to, a few large companies located for the most part outside the state. For example:

> In the early 1930s, three firms — Gerrard, AFG [American Fruit Growers, which succeeded Crutchfield and Woolfolk] and Stanley [The Stanley Fruit Company, apparently local] — controlled about half of the total cantaloupe and honeydew melon acreages; and five, including those three and Sawdey & Hent [of Los Angeles and Imperial Valley] and Western Vegetable Distributors [owned by two Denver men] had from 40 to 50 per cent of the total lettuce each year.[19]

County Closeups

Because agriculture varies widely from one section of the country to another, the picture for the nation as a whole cannot be gained in any one locale. The three brief closeups which follow are of particular interest because of the large number of farm workers hired in these counties and because gross farm income in the counties is considerably higher than the national average.

Fresno County

Fresno County, California, has for some years had the distinction of being the richest farm county in the nation. About 23 per cent of the farms had wage bills of $5,000 or more, and these paid an estimated 82 per cent of the total county farm wage bill. Seventeen per cent of all farms in Fresno reported no hired labor, and another 25 per cent reported annual labor costs of less than $1,000.

An unusual amount of information about the hired farm working force in the county is available because of a survey conducted by the Fresno Community Council in 1959. The survey found that wages on the large "West Side" farms generally ran from 75 to 95 cents an hour. Wages on the smaller farms on the east side of the Valley averaged a dollar an hour or more. A large majority (73 per cent) of the families estimated that their financial status was at the same level as or below that of their parents.[20]

Some of the less fortunate farm workers of Fresno were described in a report in The New York Times, July 30, 1961:

> Baking in the 110-degree heat on the west side of California's lush Central Valley forty miles from Fresno lies a fetid cluster of fifty shacks. Here, in the heart of the nation's richest farm country, 400 members of farm labor families are sweating out the harvest season in eighteenth-century conditions. Most of the one-room shacks have eight to ten occupants. One spigot supplies water for the entire camp. . . .

An estimated two-thirds of Class II farms have sales below the county average. This would mean the total number of farms selling less than the county average amounts to about 81.2% of farms in the county.

Note on procedure: Total sales for each group of farms are estimated by assuming the midpoint of its range of sales to be the average. Since the total county sales are reported in the Census, the total sales for farms selling $40,000 or more was obtained by subtracting the totals for the other sub-groups from the known county total.

The 137 farms (1.8% of county total) reported to be 2,000 acres or larger account for 406,759 acres, or 44.6% of all cropland harvested. Note on procedure: County data in the Census of Agriculture are not as refined as state and national data. Many items are reported for counties only in terms of intervals rather than absolute figures, and it is therefore necessary to make estimates.

Total hired farm labor expenditures for each group are estimated by assuming the midpoint of its range of farm labor expenditures to be the average. Since the total expenditure for the county is given and the number of farms reporting hired labor is given by intervals, the estimate of total expenditures for farms paying $5,000 or more in wages was obtained by subtracting the estimated totals for the other subgroups from the total county farm wage bill.

The shacks at Three Rocks, in the words of the camp operator Raymond Minnite, "aren't worth a dime and aren't fit to live in or sleep in." Yet he charges $15 a month rent for each unit. . . .

Imperial County

Contrasts between large and small farmers in Imperial County, California, the nation's fifth richest farm county, are even more startling. Imperial County lies just north of the Mexican border. Sixty years ago the area was a worthless desert. Now some of the largest agribusiness corporations in the nation have farms and packing facilities there. Much as in Arizona, farming operations are largely dependent upon a water supply from projects built and financed by American taxpayers.

Twenty-five per cent of all the Valley farms use no hired labor, and 15 per cent more use little or none. At the other end of the scale, nearly 43 per cent of the farms pay an estimated 97 per cent of the county farm wage bill. Annual sales per farm for the county as a whole average $141,802. Yet 40 per cent of the farms sell less than the $10,000 required in 1959 for an annual income of $2,500; thus it is the sales of the others, well into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, which bring the average up so high.

A vivid description of agribusiness in the Imperial Valley was given on March 20, 1961, in the Los Angeles Times, a newspaper owned by a family which also has large ranch holdings:

Herb Lee, the personable young vice president of Brock Ranches, can look out the big window of his modern new office and, without moving, watch the asparagus that helps pay his salary go from ground to packing crate. Set in the midst of cropland a few miles southwest of El Centro, the seat of California's Imperial County, the quarter-million dollar packing shed of which Lee's office is a part exemplifies agribusiness at its best.

It symbolizes the complete merging of traditional farming, mechanized packing and managerial skill. It also points up the meticulous attention given by California grower-shippers these days to marketing attractive products. If they don't, they can't hope to compete on the eastern market with farmers in other regions whose fixed costs are considerably lower.

The big shed, which houses facilities for the packing of 6,000 ready-to-be-shipped crates of asparagus a day, most of all typifies the extent of industrialization among Imperial Valley farms.

A typically mechanized operation in the Imperial Valley is conducted by the Joe Maggio Co., whose carrot acreage there and near King City (some 400 miles north) produces 90 per cent of the commercial bunch carrots in the United States.

* * *

Although the firm's huge packing shed is used primarily for its own products, Maggio — and most similar operators — makes the most of his facility by contracting with smaller farms for the packing and shipping of their vegetables. Brock and Maggio illustrate the tendency among large growers to extend their operations into shipping and in a few cases, even processing and marketing. . . .

Another side of the picture was reported at March, 1963, hearings before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture. A minister who watched the trek of workers through California said, "We have been talking in terms of dollars and cents but what about the human values involved in all of this?"

My church sits on Highway 66. I have been told that it is the only church on Highway 66 for some 600 miles and I have 10 and 12 and 20 people a week coming to the door wanting help. I kept a record for a while. A third of them were migrant workers, either coming to California or leaving California, coming to California because they had heard how good the wages were out there for the farmworkers, and leaving because they found that the jobs were being taken by the braceros too often for them to earn a living for their families. . . .

Mention was made of the slums of New York. We have slums in Los Angeles too. But our slum dweller when he gets hungry can find something to eat and he can get a relief check and get some help, but the migrant worker too often has no help available, no place to go. He knocks on the door of my church and what can I tell him? There is no work? We have such a stream we can't feed you?[21]

Mississippi County

Mississippi County, Arkansas, the third illustrative county, is an area of great wealth and stark poverty. Arkansas is not usually considered a wealthy state. But the large cotton plantations in the Mississippi Delta occupy some of the richest soil in the nation.

Mississippi County is a leading cotton producer. Annual sales per farm average just under $20,000, but more than two-thirds of the farms fall below the average and nearly 60 per cent fail to sell $10,000 worth of farm goods. At the top, 13.6 per cent of the farms account for about 63 per cent of the total sales, with an estimated average of just under $90,000.

An estimated 400 of the 465 Class III farms have sales below the county average of $19,697. This would mean that approximately 2,136 farms, or 74.6% of farms reporting, fall below the average sales per farm in this county.

More than one-fourth of the farms in the county hire no labor, and an additional 30 per cent have annual labor costs of less than $1,000. At the other end, 20 per cent of the farms pay an estimated 83.6 per cent of the total county farm wage bill.

These large cotton plantations in the Delta have for years paid the lowest wages in the nation. In 1961 a number of large plantations were reportedly paying 30 cents an hour or $3 for a 10-hour day (not counting travel time, although many of the workers came across the river from Memphis). The harvest rate itself remained $2.85 per hundred pounds for the entire period from 1950 to 1960.[22] Human labor was cheaper than machinery, and the present mechanization in the area is the employers' answer to attempts to raise the substandard wages of exploited workers. The Employment and Wage Supplement of the August, 1963, issue of Farm Labor Market Developments still showed areas in Arkansas with a 35-cent an hour wage rate, and other areas with only 40- and 50-cent hourly rates.

The poverty of the people who live here is hard for the average American to comprehend. In Mississippi County 40 per cent of the population (27,000 people) receive federal surplus food. Eligibility for this is, for a single person, an earned income of less than $900 a year; the cutoff point for families is $1,500.

The United States Representative from this district, E. C. Gathings, revealed why people can be persuaded to work for 30 cents an hour when he reported, "So they took that 17,000 [of the 27,000] off the rolls and said to them 'until such time as you get out there to help us harvest our crops, you cannot receive these foods.' "[23] (Gathings is a leading member of the House Agriculture Committee and is chairman of the subcommittee to which the Mexican labor importation program has been referred.)

Nor is Mississippi County unique in this practice. In nearby St. Francis County, at the same time as Gathings made his statement, 14,000 of the 19,000 on the food rolls were dropped. The headline in a local paper read: "County Judge Slashes Surplus Food List to Provide Local Labor for Cotton Harvest."[24]

Workers from Abroad

The kind of economic pressure described in the section on Mississippi County is one reason for the lowest wages in the nation. But it is not the whole explanation. In 1948 the average wage for picking cotton in Arkansas was $3.25 per hundred pounds, and some pickers earned as much as $4.00.[25] In the fall of 1949, Mexican contract workers were introduced, and by 1950 wages had dropped to $2.85, a rate that prevailed for a decade. Such a wage freeze, while wages in other industries were rising, will take years to overcome even after the Mexican program has been terminated.

One of the consequences has been to drive domestic workers away. A New York Times article of February 26, 1961, reported some examples. A middle-aged farmer named Glen Horn, from the Clay City area, said that he and his wife and children had been forced by economic necessity to migrate five times to the state of Washington to work in the orchards there. Washington is nearly 2,500 miles from this man's home. Just three counties away in his home state he could have chopped cotton at the time for forty cents an hour. Small wonder that the growers reported a labor shortage in the area and obtained 6,000 Mexican contract workers! Another migrant, Calvin Stone, was quoted in the same article: "Wish we could all find something so we didn't have to go. I don't believe there's anybody around these parts who wouldn't work right here if they had a chance."

But widespread employment of foreign workers and a rapid increase in mechanization have combined to produce a high rate of rural unemployment. Since 1959, displacement through mechanization of the cotton harvest alone has added up to man hours equivalent to the labor of at least a quarter of a million workers.[26]

More than 70% of the U.S.A. cotton crop in 1963 picked by machine.

The Mexican Contract Labor Program

Despite the concerted efforts of many civic, labor, and religious organizations to prevent an extension of the Mexican contract labor program beyond its expiration date of December 31, 1963, the United States Senate, on July 15, 1963, passed a one-year extension bill. And although the House of Representatives had earlier rejected a proposal to extend the program for two years, the one-year extension may well gain approval. The new Senate bill does contain several stipulations which would provide domestic farm workers with some of the same protections currently given the Mexicans – namely, workmen's compensation or occupational insurance, housing and transportation expenses, and a guaranteed minimum amount of work. While these protections, if accepted in the House and enacted into law, will serve to narrow the existing differential between the working conditions of domestic and Mexican workers, many of the adverse effects of the program will, nevertheless, continue even beyond its termination. Therefore, a brief analysis of the program and its effects is indicated.

The depressing effect on wage rates cited in respect to the Arkansas harvest could be duplicated wherever braceros are used. At the March, 1963, Congressional Committee hearings on bills to extend Public Law 78 (the Mexican contract labor program), these figures were presented:

> In California's desert and border counties, San Diego, Imperial and East Riverside, a composite farm wage index using 1952 as 100, shows more than a 3-percent decline by 1959. In the Imperial Valley an hourly wage rate of 70 cents stood unchanged until 1960. Agricultural wages in this same area, as a percentage of manufacturing wages in San Diego County, show a decline from 41.5 percent in 1952 to 28.6 percent in 1959.[27]

The picture is even worse for individual crops such as tomatoes, where braceros were used to such an extent that domestic workers were driven out. Even though the law states that braceros may not be used where their employment will adversely affect domestic workers, a simple axiom of economics has held true: scarcity raises the value of a commodity; surplus lowers the value. The very establishment of machinery for securing a potentially endless supply of workers from across the Mexican border lowered the value of domestic labor.

Conditions of work and of living also worsened as the result of the program. The braceros were single men or left their families in Mexico. As a consequence, housing for family groups was replaced, over the years, by barracks or worse. The Mexicans came into a strange country; knowing neither the customs nor the language, they were unable to take advantage of their rights under the international agreement. It was easy for employers to introduce "speed-up" systems and to drop humane practices such as a ten-minute rest break, and providing drinking water in the field.

Public Law 78, under which the Mexican program is still operating, was passed as an emergency measure during the Korean War. Thus for more than a decade farm labor standards have been deteriorating and wages falling behind gains made by workers in other parts of the economy. The termination of the Mexican program might prevent further retrogression; a one-year extension, with amendments to protect domestic workers, might counteract some of the adverse effect resulting from the use of Mexican workers; but neither would, of itself, recover what has been lost.

Other Imported Workers

Although the vast majority of imported workers in the agricultural labor force are Mexicans brought in under contract, they are by no means the only outside group to find employment in the United States, nor are they the only Mexicans.

Mexican workers enter the United States in two other ways that must be given particular attention when the present labor importation program is ended. The first is often given as an argument for continuation of the contract program. Its supporters claim that farm workers will enter illegally (as wetbacks) in great numbers, without any of the protections of Public Law 78, if they are not allowed to enter legally. This is a problem of law enforcement, not of labor standards. Wetbacks once entered in the hundreds of thousands; this influx was stopped and its renewal can be forestalled by adequate border patrol and inspection.

Another importation device not covered by Public Law 78 is the use of legal immigration to secure farm workers. Under an agreement between the Department of Labor and the Department of State, such immigrants, called "green carders," must present job orders which have been endorsed by the local office of the U. S. Employment Service to determine whether the immigrant's entry would adversely affect the wages and working conditions of domestic workers. Legal immigration for purposes of permanent settlement is one thing. But any attempt by employers to circumvent present regulations for protection of domestic workers by use of immigration procedures must be guarded against. Adequate enforcement machinery can do so.

The same areas (west and southwest) which now use most of the Mexicans have opened two other labor sources which employers may attempt to utilize in the event that the Mexican program is terminated. These are arrangements for the importation of Japanese and Filipino workers. Thus far no attempt has been made to increase their use beyond a few thousand workers, probably because the comparative cost of securing Mexicans has been considerably less. It is difficult to see how any justification can be made for bringing workers across the Pacific to work in American agriculture unless it is acknowledged that this is a "stand-by" program. Nevertheless, all the machinery is ready and these programs could be stepped up to replace the Mexican program, thus assuring an endless cheap-labor supply to compete with domestic workers. These programs, too, should be terminated.

In the northeast a number of Canadians enter annually to work on farms. Last year nearly 9,000 were brought in, mainly to harvest potatoes in Maine. However, their average employment period was less than one month, and has not constituted a serious threat to domestic farm workers.

A far more serious problem lies in the program for importation of workers from the British West Indies. Following exposure in the late fifties of the terrible conditions under which these workers lived and worked, and because of the rising pressure of domestic unemployment, the number of British West Indians imported began to decline. States along the eastern seaboard from the Middle Atlantic down to Virginia, which once were large users, had nearly eliminated the importation of British West Indians. But in the past four years the number of British West Indians has risen again, largely in the Florida sugar industry, which has rapidly expanded since the Cuban revolution. This new development in agriculture should have opened up new jobs for domestics, especially since Florida is surrounded by labor-surplus areas from which farm workers migrate north. Instead sugar growers turned to importation for the workers they needed. However, it is interesting to note that of the 7,500 employed in Florida last winter, nearly half were working not in sugar, but in citrus.[28] Here is one of the dangers of any importation program. Ostensibly needed for one type of work, the workers are found replacing domestics in other fields as well, once the program is under way.

In a different category are Puerto Rican workers who can, of course, enter the country without restriction. The Puerto Rican government has encouraged them to do so through a contract program which has been far better than that available to domestics or foreign workers, and therefore has had some influence in raising standards elsewhere (for instance, by demonstrating the feasibility of work guarantees). The peak number of workers in 1962 was 13,000, half of whom worked in New Jersey vegetable crops.[29] Enforcement of standards for Puerto Ricans is also, by and large, more adequate than that for other contract workers in the United States. But it is estimated that an equal number of Puerto Ricans enter without the benefit of the contract and many of these are subjected to severe exploitation. Like domestic workers, they can be protected only by legislation establishing minimum standards for agricultural workers.

Legislation for Farm Workers

A number of legislative proposals to ameliorate the conditions of domestic farm workers have been introduced into Congress, both in the past and in the first session of the 88th Congress. These proposals make no demands upon farm employers that other employers have not been meeting for decades, and some require nothing of the employers at all.

These legislative proposals are of two kinds: those necessitated by the special problems of migrants and farm workers; and others which would extend to farm workers the protection and benefits of social legislation already enjoyed by most other American workers.

The 87th Congress passed the Migrant Health Act; and an additional health proposal, a sanitation assistance program, is now before the 88th Congress. The assistance provided for construction or renovation of sanitary facilities would not only aid migrants, but would be a protective measure for nearby communities and for consumers of the products harvested by the migrants.

Three measures would aid the children of farm workers. One would assist the states in meeting the costs of educating migrant children (and would include pilot projects in the education of adult migrants). A second would provide matching grants to states to establish and operate day-care centers for migrant children. Since all adults in a migrant family work, children may either be taken into the fields with them or left in the care of older children in the camp. The centers would provide much-needed care and prevent tragedies that now may occur through unavoidable neglect.

Limitation of the work of children in agriculture is the third of these measures. Children are usually found working both because the family income is so low that no contributor to it can be spared, and because there is nothing else for them to do away from home. The education and child-care measures solve part of the problem, and parents are usually eager, despite their poverty, for their children to have all possible advantages. The presently proposed measure would not prevent children from working for their parents on a home farm. It would permit a child to work outside of school hours if he is 14 years of age or older, or if he is between 12 and 14 and commutes daily from his permanent residence and has the written consent of his parent, or if his parent is employed on the same farm.

Several miscellaneous proposals would tackle various aspects of the migrant worker situation. One proposal is to set up a fifteen-member National Advisory Council to advise the President and Congress about the functioning of laws, regulations, programs, and policies concerned with migrant workers. Another would provide for registration of crew leaders, who serve virtually as employers of migrants; this would help to check frequent exploitation and misuse of workers who are dependent upon the crew leaders. A Voluntary Farm Employment Service Act would help to stabilize the supply of domestic workers by providing fuller employment, assured transportation, and other services. Still another bill would assist in the provision of housing for domestic farm labor by offering additional loans and loan insurance for housing construction, improvements, and repairs, and by offering direct financial assistance for the establishment of low-rent housing for domestic farm workers.

All of these measures are important, but the most essential proposals, without which the others cannot be really effective, are those which would help to raise the wages and working conditions of farm workers.

Neither federal nor state laws presently provide for collective bargaining for agricultural workers, a denial of basic rights afforded other Americans for thirty years. Pending legislation would amend the National Labor Relations Act to extend collective bargaining rights to agricultural employees. Despite the absence of legal coverage, efforts to organize farm workers have been made over the years and are continuing, particularly in California. The seasonal and mobile nature of agricultural labor has created unusual difficulties. Farm workers' strikes have been broken time and again by imported braceros. Local ordinances have been used in some areas to destroy elementary civil liberties in the effort to block unionization. But the attempt to organize farm workers continues and deserves protection under the law.

The most fundamental legislation of all is the extension of minimum wage coverage (which most other workers have enjoyed for twenty-five years) to agricultural workers. As a result of their exclusion from the Fair Labor Standards Act, farm workers' wages are not only below the industrial minimum, but also, in many areas, below a subsistence level as well. Poor health, inadequate housing, widespread child labor — all are inextricably tied to the income the farm worker can earn. The soundest way to relieve these conditions is to start by raising his basic wage.

The idea of a minimum wage has come under the sharpest attack by farm employers, although the proposals made to Congress have been modest and hedged around with precautions. Only three-fifths of one per cent of all farms would be affected by the minimum wage bill: that is, farms using more than 560 man-days in a calendar quarter. The giant corporations discussed earlier would be covered by it, but few others.

Nor has it been proposed to give farm workers the same minimum wage as other workers immediately. Instead, the suggestion is for a 75-cent an hour minimum the first year, 85 cents the second, $1.00 the third, and the industrial minimum of $1.25 in the fourth.

"Agriculture is Different"

The standard argument of agribusiness in opposing farm worker legislation has been that "agriculture is different." At hearings, in all the forums of public opinion, and in their own press, agricultural employers appear to be raising five objections:

1) farm wages are increasing rapidly in a period in which farm income is declining;
2) farmers alone have no control over their expenses – they deal with fixed costs;
3) farmers alone have no control over the prices they receive for their commodities;
4) any increase in farm wages would burden small farmers more than large farmers;
5) the inferior position of farm workers is due to the fact that they are inferior people.

Wages and Income

The assistant legislative director of the American Farm Bureau Federation has stated:

> Farm wages may not be increasing as fast as some people think they should, but they are increasing rapidly, and during a period in which farm incomes have declined; they are the most rapidly increasing cost element, ratewise, contributing to the farm cost-price squeeze.[30]

This contention is untrue. The relative increase and importance of various production costs for farms as a whole are shown in Table VII. Labor costs have risen less than any other item. It is capital equipment costs that have been going up. In 1950 wages made up 14 per cent of total farm expenditure; in 1959, 11 per cent. During the same period the cost of operation and depreciation of capital equipment rose from 29 to 31 per cent.[31] As the tempo of mechanization continues to increase, this trend will be accentuated.

Table VII
Per cent Change in Aggregate Production Costs of All Farm Operators, 1947-49 to 1960

U.S. Department of Labor: Hired Farm Workers in the United States, June, 1961; p. 5.

Moreover, since most farmers hire little or no labor, labor costs are not a significant proportion of their production costs. On the contrary, the income of many farmers is driven down by competition with the cheap labor of the corporation farms.

Who Controls Costs?

"Farmers have no control over their costs." This view, frequently expressed by farm employers, has been well summed up by a writer sympathetic to them:

> . . . farm employers consider themselves to be the residual receivers of income derived from the sale of agricultural products, meaning that everyone who deals with farmers, from the implement and fertilizer dealers to the truckers, commission merchants and processors gets his take or profit on an absolute basis — and the farmers must be content with what's left over. . . .

The commercial farmer argues that because he is a victim of oligopoly, buying the goods and services he needs in an administered price market, any additional cost for "labor, fringes, and accessories," as one of them put it, "cannot be passed on to the consumer under the present structure of agriculture."[32]
